With Shankara's Commentary

Edited

With a new sub-commentary

by

Sri Swami Satchidanandendra Saraswati

1. "In the sub-commentary the Swamiji has not only explained the Bhashya clearly but also brought out the comparative excellence of Shankara's interpretation. The author has given a beautiful introduction. An Appendix incorporating two indexes – one for the important words occurring in the Bhashya and another a fairly exhaustive subject-index to the sub-commentary– has been added. This is indeed an erudite and scholarly work of love which will benefit all students of Vedanta. The book is very neatly printed and get up."

— The Vision

2. "The Swamiji's commentary is highly illuminating. Basing himself on Sri Shankara's Bhashya, the Vartikas of Suresvaracharya and Gaudapada's Karikas, and pressing into service Sri Shankara's commentaries on the Gita, the Brahma-Sutras and other works of the Acharya, the Swamiji has rendered his commentary in the truly traditional method and at the same time he has with incisive logic met and answered all the objections of the other schools of thought. ..... The name of the commentary 'Bhashyartha-Vimarshini' is very apt as it not only makes the text clear, but the real import of the Bhashya is very accurately and faithfully brought out."

PUBLISHER'S NOTE

Swami Sri Satchidanandendra Saraswati Maharaj has blessed the Adhyatma Prakasha Karyalaya with one more original work in Sanskrit. This attempt is unique in that it reduces all the seemingly various methods of presentation employed in the different Upanishads to the only comprehensive method which lays bare the true nature of Vedic Revelation of the Self-existing Reality or Brahman which for ever shines forth as the witnessing Self in all beings.

In his learned Introduction in English, Sri Swamiji has explained at great length how this traditional method elucidates the central theme of the Upanishads and convincingly reconciles all apparently conflicting doctrines in these sacred works. He has also given us a brief account of the history of Vedantic thought as far as available from the remotest times, and promises to bring this narration down to our own times in the second volume of this valuable work.

One fact emerges from this brief summary of the different Vedantic Schools prior and subsequent to Śaṅkara and his great preceptor Gaudapāda. Side by side with the tradition of absolutism which these two great teachers have indelibly perpetuated in their works, there were other monistic schools which claimed to represent the original U panishadic teachings. Except for one honourable exception in Sures'varācārya, all other post-S'aṅkara advaitins, even while professing to explain S'aṅkara, have succumbed either to the influence of the ancient monists or to that of the later dualistic Vedantins and thus lost sight of the only method which holds the key to the right understanding of the Upanishadic teaching. Swamiji has made this point abundantly clear through his critical appreciations of the various schools examined in the body of the present work. It is our firm conviction that this is the first attempt of its kind, and that it is sure to revolutionize many of the current notions regarding the true nature of S'aṅkara's Vedanta.

The Introduction is thus in itself a solid contribution to Vedantic thought, and therefore, at the suggestion of some of our friends, we are bringing it out as a separate publication for the benefit of those who would have a handy book at a moderate price, containing in a nut-shell the most up-to-date reliable information on S'ānkara-Vedanta pure and simple, purged of all later accretions, while also giving a critical account of the distinctive features of the sub-commentaries of the most important advaitic thinkers.

The Working Committee of the Karyalaya are highly grateful to the several ladies and gentlemen who have made the publication of this first volume possible through their generous contributions. Our warm thanks are due especially to the following personages: His Holiness Sri Saṅkarācārya of Sriṅgeri Sāradā Peeth who made a voluntary donation at the time of his visit to the Kāryālaya as a token of his blessings for the thriving of this publication; Sri T. Manjunatha Iyer, Coffee Planter, Mysore and Sri V. Rāma Mūrthy, Architect and Engineer, Narasimharaja Colony, Bangalore, both of whom have made a magnanimous contribution that covered almost half the printing expenses; to a gentleman of Bombay who while continuing his liberal aid, prefers to remain anonymous; to Smt. Mattūr Lakshmīdevamma, Shimoga, to Sri Khode Iśvara Sā of Bangalore and to Devatā Sri Rāmayya Śetty, Bangalore.

Our thanks are due to Ved. Br. Sri. Parakkaje Subrahmaṇya Bhatta, Vedanta Śiromaṇi, and Paṇdita Pravara Bra. Śrī. H. Ananta Mūrty Śastrigal, who read the manuscript and offered useful suggestions. Br. Śrī H. S. Lakshmīnarasimha Mūrthy, Adhyātma-Vidyā-Praveeṇa, Pandit, Adhyātma College, Holenarsipur, has helped in correcting the proof-sheets, and Śrī D. Veṅkateśiah, M.A., has co-operated in writing out a fair copy of the English Introduction. Prof. M. Yāmunāchārya, M.A., has kindly obliged us by going through the manuscript once.

To all those who have helped in this connection, His Holiness Sri Swami Satchidanandendra Saraswatiji has asked us to record his heart-felt Nārāyaṇa-smaraṇams.

The Adhyātma Prakāsha Press have taken very great pains to promote this work by employing a special compositor for setting the Dēvanāgarī and English types. They have secured new English types specially for this publication. Our deep-felt thanks are due to them.

We apologize for the many printing mistakes that have crept in. They could not be avoided for many reasons chief of which are the failing eye-sight of our Swamiji and the usual handicaps from which our small press could not escape. For all these and other defects we crave the indulgence of the reader interested in this publication, striving to present the Unique Method of Vedanta for the first time in its pristine glory.

INTRODUCTION

SECTION ONE

THE ORTHODOX VIEW OF THE UPANISHADS

1. Questions that puzzle the students of Vedānta

Modern students of the Upanishads, are often bewildered by the numerous conflicting opinions of research-scholars no less than by the various presentations of the system of thought contained in those sacred works. Which is the genuine system of Vedānta, if there be any, contained in the classical Upanishads, and what is the method, if there be one, adopted therein to develop that system? Is there any unity of teaching, as claimed by tradition, in these Upanishads, the Bhagavadgīta and the Brahma-Sūtrās? Would it be possible to determine the system of Vedānta by an independent study of the Upanishads or with the help of the Bhagavadgīta and the Brahma-Sūtrās? Or, if we are obliged to take any interpreter as a safe guide in this matter, how is he to be spotted? And on what principles are we to determine his system itself, in case we happen to have various accounts of it clashing with one another? And finally, if we do light upon a system of Vedānta, what is the value to be attached to it, based as it is on the Vedās, when compared to the advanced philosophies of modern independent thinkers of the west?

Both to the orthodox pundits of the several schools of Vedānta, and to that section of our college-educated young men who invariably look to research-scholars for inspiration in such matters, it is a matter of indifference how these and other kindred questions are answered. The former look on their respective Bhāshyakāras as an authority beyond all doubt and dispute, and armed to the teeth with quotations and principles of exegesis and scholastic logic, they are ever ready to defend their views against all opposition. And the latter group rest content with voicing forth the opinion of the particular scholar whom they admire most. The present treatise, however, is intended for the orthodox section of critical students of Vedānta who are not biased either way, but are earnestly seeking after any real help in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion in the matter.

2. Independent study of the Prasthānās fruitless.

Scholars are divided in their opinion as to whether or not, students of the three Prasthānās of Vedānta — to wit, the Upanishads, the Bhagavadgīta and the Brahma-Sūtrās — should be guided by a particular commentator. In the body of the present work (chapter two), I have explained why an independent study of these three divisions of Vedāntic works, is not likely to be helpful in ascertaining either the system presented therein or the method adopted to work it out. Modern scholars, eastern or western, have come pretty much to the same conclusion though for different reasons. Here are some specimens of their pronouncements :—

(1) "A system of the Upanishads, strictly speaking does not exist. For these treatises are not the work of a single genius, but the total philosophical product of a entire epoch."

P. Deussen, Pu. p. 51

(2) " 'There is little that is spiritual in all this'; 'this empty intellectual conception, void of spirituality, is the highest form that the Indian mind is capable of'."

Gough, quoted by S. Radhakrishnan, IP. Vol. 1, p. 139

(3) "If anything is evident even on a cursory review of the Upanishads-and the impression so created is only strengthened by a more careful investigation- it is that they do not constitute a systematic whole."

G. Thibaut, VS. Intro. ciii

"If we understand by philosophy a philosophical system coherent in all its parts, free from all contradictions and allowing room for all the different statements made in all the chief Upanishads, a philosophy of the Upanishads cannot even be spoken of."

ibid, p. cxiv

(4) "For gaining an insight into the early growth of Indian philosophic thought, this period (the Upanishadic period) is in fact the most valuable; though of systematised philosophy, in our sense of the word, it contains, as yet, little or nothing."

Max-Muller, SS. p. 6

"With us a philosophy always means something systematic, while what we find here (in the Upanishads) are philosophic rhapsodies rather than consecutive treatises."

ibid, p. 182

श्रीश्रीसच्चिदानन्देन्द्रसरस्वतीसंयमिनः

(5) " The upanishads had no set theory of philosophy or dogmatic scheme of theology to propound. They hint at the truth in life, but not as yet in science or philosophy. So numerous are their suggestions of truth, so various are their guesses at God, that almost anybody may seek in them what he wants and find what he seeks, and every school of dogmatics may congratulate itself on finding its own doctrine in the sayings of the Upanishads. "

S. Radhakrishnan, IP. p. 140

(6) " The difficulty of assuring oneself that any interpretation is absolutely the right one is enhanced by the fact that germs of diverse kinds of thoughts are found scattered over the Upanishads which are not worked out in a systematic manner. "

Dasgupta, HIP Vol. I. p. 41-42

" Under these circumstances it is necessary that a modern interpreter of the Upanishads should turn a deaf ear to the absolute claims of these exponents, and look upon the Upanishads not as a systematic treatise but as a repository of diverse currents of thought - the melting pot in which all later philosophic ideas were still in a state of fusion. " ibid, p. 42

So much for the Upanishads independently studied. And what about the Gita ? I shall begin with a quotation from Swami Vivekānanda :

" Than the Gita no better commentary on the Vedas has been written or can be written. The essence of the Śrutis, or of the Upanishads, is hard to be understood, seeing that there are so many commentators, each one trying to interpret in his own way. Then the Lord Himself comes, He who is the inspirer of the S'rutis, to show us the meaning of them, as the preacher of the Gītā, and today India wants nothing better, the world wants nothing better than that method of interpretation. "

FCA, pp. 178-179.

And yet, this divine commentary, has met with no better fate at the hands of not only indigenous commentators, but also of the scholars who charge them with being warped by pre-conceived notions ! The warring interpretations of the former, are well known to our readers. I shall therefore rest content with exhibiting very briefly what the independent interpreters of the Gīta, have got to say. An extract from Dr. S. Radhakrishnan's 'Indian Philosophy', will be quite sufficient, in my opinion, for our present purpose.

1. " Finding that the Gītā is not a consistent piece of doctrine, different writers try to account for it in different ways. Garbe and Hopkins suppose that several writers in different centuries have been at work upon it. According to Garbe the original Gītā was written in the second century B. C. as a theistic tract, based on the Sāṅkhya-Yōga, though in the second century A. D. it was adopted by the upholders of the Upanishad monism. 'These two doctrines — the theistic and the pantheistic — are mixed up with each other, and follow each other, sometimes quite un-connected and sometimes loosely connected. And it is not the case that the one is represented as a lower exoteric and the other as the higher esoteric doctrine.....' Hopkins makes the Gita a Kṛshṇaite version of a Vishṇuite poem, which was itself a late Upanishad. Keith believes that it was originally an Upanishad of the type of S'vetās'vatara, but was later adapted to the cult of Kṛshṇa. Holtzmann looks upon it as Vishṇuite re-modelling of a pantheistic poem. Barnett thinks that different streams of tradition became confused in the mind of the author. Deussen makes it a late product of the degeneration of the monistic thought of the Upanishads belonging to a period of transition from theism to realistic atheism."

IP, Vol, I, p. 530.

Radhakrishnan himself is of the opinion that "there is no need to accept any of these conjectures. The Gītā is an application of the Upanishad ideal to the new situations which arose at the time of the Mahābhārata. In adapting the idealism of the Upanishads to a theistically minded people, it attempts to derive a religion from the Upanishad philosophy."

ibid. p. 530.

2. Prof. Dasgupta writes :

" I suppose it has been amply proved that, in the light of un-contradicted tradition of the Mahābhārata and the Pāñca-rātra literature, the Gītā is to be regarded as a work of the Bhāgavata school, and an internal analysis of the work also shows that the Gītā is neither an ordinary Sāṅkhya nor a Vedānta work, but represents some older system wherein the views of an earlier school of Sāṅkhya are mixed up with Vedāntic ideas different from the Vedānta as interpreted by Śaṅkara. "

HIP. Vol II, p. 550.

Let us now turn to the Brahma-sūtrās. The difficulty in determining their purport independently is too obvious to require any proof. Attempts have been made, however, to ascertain whether or not they faithfully interpret the import of the Upanishads with equally jejune results. I shall quote a few opinions of scholars who have studied the problem, from different stand-points.

1. George Thibaut, who has translated the Vedānta Sūtras with Śaṅkara's Bhāshya, says :

" There are, moreover, other facts in the history of Indian Philosophy and theology which help us better to appreciate the possibility of Bādarāyaṇa's Sūtrās already setting forth a doctrine that lays greater stress on the personal character of the highest being than is in agreement with the prevailing tendency of the Upanishads. That the pure doctrine of these ancient Brahminical treatises underwent at a rather early period amalgamations with beliefs which most probably had sprung up in altogether different - priestly or non-priestly - communities is a well-known circumstance .... The attempts of a certain (?) set of Indian commentators to explain it (the Bhagavadgīta) as setting forth pure Vedānta i. e. the pure doctrine of the Upanishads, may simply be set aside. But this same Bhagavadgītā is quoted in Badarāyaṇa's Sūtrās (at least according to the unanimous explanations of the most eminent scholiasts of different schools) as inferior to Śruti only in authority. The Sūtrās, moreover, refer in different places to certain Vedāntic portions of the Mahābhārata, especially the twelfth book, several of which represent forms of Vedanta distinctly differing from Śaṅkara's teaching, and closely related to the system of the Bhāgavatas.

Facts of this nature-from entering into the details of which we are prevented by want of space—tend to mitigate the prima facie strangeness of the assumption that the Vedānta Sūtrās, which occupy an intermediate position between the Upanishads and S'aṅkara, should yet diverge in their teaching from both. "

VS. Intro. pp. cxxvi-cxxvii.

2. Deussen who had explained the Sūtras in accordance with his own light, had this to say on the subject :

"The Sūtras become a connected whole only through the explanations interwoven among them by oral or written exposition. For without this the 555 Sūtras consisting for the most part of two or three words each, in which our author lays down the whole Vedanta system, are utterly unintelligible, especially as they contain, not so much the leading words of the system, as the catch words, for the memory to grasp, and these seldom exhibit the main matter, but frequently something quite subordinate, have often a quite general indeterminate form, which fits the most different circumstances and leaves everything to the interpreter. " SV. Introduction, p. 26.

3. And Radhakrishnan writes thus :

" The Sūtras are unintelligible by themselves, and leave everything to the interpreter. They refuse, Proteus-like, to be caught in any definite shape. Their teaching is interpreted sometimes in the bright hues of personal theism, sometimes in the grey abstractions of absolutism. " IP Vol. II, p. 431.

4. Another Indian scholar writes as follows :

" It seems that Bādarāyaṇa, the writer of the Brahma-Sūtras, was probably more a theist, than an absolutist like his commentator S'aṅkara. "

HIP. Vol. I p. 422.

"A study of the extant commentaries on the Brahma-Sūtras of Bādarāyaṇa by the adherents of different schools of thought leaves us convinced that these sūtras were regarded by all as condensations of the teaching of the Upanishads."

ibid, Vol. 1 p. 433.

I trust that the above extracts will be quite sufficient to convince the readers that the peculiar method of approach adopted by the researh-scholars, has uniformly acted as a self-imposed barrier in their way into the heart of the three Prasthānās. They start, in the first place, with a firm conviction that there can be no philosophy in the Upanishads, and, in the second place, feel sure that a historical development of thought can be traced from the Upanishadic period down to our own times, and hence that it is a wild-goose chase to go in search of a system common to all the three divisions of Vedāntic works as the orthodox paṇdits do. They are, moreover, obsessed by the idea that philosophy in the western sense is the only one possible in the nature of things, that speculation is the only means of ascertaining truth and that eternal truths as contrasted with growing theoretical truths, are beyond human ken. It is therefore most unlikely that the western way of thinking can ever aspire to appreciate genuine Vedānta, so long as the fundamental attitude and the traditional methods of the Upanishads and kindred writings are not taken into account.

3. Primary Importance of S'aṅkara's Bhāshyas

The impossibility of recognizing a system in the Upanishads by means of an independent study being admitted, it necessarily follows that we should seek aid from some trust-worthy commentator in entering into the spirit of the Upanishadic teachings. In the third chapter of this work, I have stated my reasons very briefly for relying upon Sańkara for this purpose. We have no Vedāntic work of any thinker previous to Gaudapāda and S'ańkara's Bhashyas are the most ancient writings available which claim to interpret all the three Prasthānas. Both Gaudapāda and S'ańkara refer to Sampradāya or traditional way of interpretation handed down from their predecessors in the line. A large majority of modern scholars, whether or not they consider S'ańkara to be faithful to his originals, are one with me in this choice. I subjoin a few extracts in corraboration of this :

1. " The greatest expositor of the philosophy of the Upanishads is S'ańkara or S'ańkarāchārya. The teaching of Sańkara himself is the natural and the legitimate interpretation of the philosophy of the Upanishads."

Gough, Preface to the Philosophy of the Upanishads p. viii.

2. "It is true that even here in the sanctuary of Vedantic mataphysics, the realistic tendencies natural to man, have penetarted, producing the misinterpreting variations of S'ańkara's, Advaita, known under the names Vis'is'tādvaita, Dvaita, S'uddhādvaita of Rāmānuja, Madhva, Vallabha,-but India till now has not been seduced by their voices, and of hundred Vedāntins (I have it from a well-informed man, who is himself a zealous adversary of S'ańkara and follower of Rāmānuja) fifteen perhaps adhere to Rāmānuja, five to Madhva, five to Vallabha and seventy-five to S'ańkarācārya. "

P, Deussen, PV [1] pp. 118-119.

1. This is from 'The Philosophy of the Vedanta ' an address delivered before the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society in 1893. This is incorporated in the 'Aspects of the Vedanta' (Natesha & Co., Madras).

3. "In the first place the Śaṅkara-Bhāshya represents the so-called orthodox side of the Brahmanical theology which strictly upholds the Brahman or Highest Self of the Upanishads as something different from, and in fact immensely superior to, the divine beings such as Vishṇu or Śiva, which for many centuries, have been the chief objects of popular worship in India. In the second place, the doctrine advocated by Śaṅkara is, from a purely philosophical point of view and apart from all theological considerations, the most important and interesting one which has arisen on Indian soil ; neither those forms which diverge from the view represented by Śaṅkara nor any of the non-Vedāntic systems can be compared with the so-called orthodox Vedānta, in boldness, depth and subtlety of speculation. In the third place, Śaṅkara's Bhāshya is, as far as we know, the oldest of the extant commentaries and relative antiquity is at any rate one of the circumstances which have to be taken into account, although, it must be admitted, too much weight may easily be attached to it. The Śaṅkara Bhāshya further is the authority most generally refered to in India as to the right understanding of the Vedānta-Sūtras, and ever since Śaṅkara's time the majority of the best thinkers of India have been men belonging to his school. If, in addition to all this, we take into consideration, the intrinsic merits of Śaṅkara's work which, as a piece of philosophical argumentation and theological apologetics, undoubtedly occupies a high rank, the preference here given to it will be easily understood.

Thibaut, VS, pp. xiv–xv.

[Thibaut, as is well known, has striven to demonstrate that in some important points their (Śrutis) teaching is more closely related to the system of Ramanuja than to that of Shankara. Nevertheless, he declares that the Vedanta of Gaudapada and Shankara "mark a strictly orthodox reaction against all combinations of non-Vedic elements of belief and doctrine with the teaching of the Upanishads".

VS, p. cxxvii]

4. "Nor have I been at all convinced that I was wrong in following a text (of the Upanishads) such as it is pre-supposed by the commentaries of S'aṅkara, instead of introducing conjectural emendations, however obvious they seem to be. Scholars should learn that the more obvious their emendations are, the more difficult it becomes to account for the introduction of such palpable corruptions into an ancient text, such as it was at the time of S'aṅkara. My determination also, whenever it was impossible to discover a satisfactory meaning, to be satisfied with S'aṅkara's interpretations, who after all lived a thousand years ago, may be criticised, and I never represented it as more than a pis aller."

Maxmuller, SS. p, 179-180.

5. "With his acute feeling of the immeasurable world, his stirring gaze into the abysmal mysteries of spirit, his unswerving resolve to say neither more nor less than what could be proved, S'aṅkara stands out as a heroic figure of the first rank in the somewhat motley crowd of the religious thinkers of medieval India. His philosophy stands forth complete, needing neither a before nor an after."

Radhakrishnan, IP. Vol. II 446.

"Through the massive and at the same time subtle dialectic of S'aṅkarā, there shows forth a vivid, emotional temperament, without which philosophy tends to become a mere game of logic."

ibid, p. 447.

6. " Though these Brahma-sūtras were differently interpreted by different exponents, the views expressed in the earliest commentary on them now available, written by S'aṅkarācārya, have attained wonderful celebrity, both on account of the subtle and deep ideas it contains, and also on account of the association of the illustrious personality of S'aṅkara.

Dasgupta, HIP, Vol. I, p. 429.

[This writer believes with Thibaut that the dualistic interpretations of the Brahma-sutras (by the Vaishnavas) have been probably more faithful to the sutras than the interpretation of Shankara.

ibid, Vol. I, p. 421.]

4. Vedāntic Traditions Antecedent to S'aṅkara

Were there different schools of Vedānta before S'aṅkara? To which traditional school of Vedāntins does S'aṅkara belong ? It appears to me that this important question has not received the attention it deserves at the hands of either Indian or foreign scholars. S'aṅkara-vijayas (poetical works treating of S'aṅkara's life and teachings) declare with one voice that S'aṅkara's work consisted in reviving the Advaitic interpretation of the Sūtras and therefore of the Upanishads- as well as in effecting certain reforms in the Hindu society of his times. Oriental scholars, mostly, do not seem to have taken up for discussion, the question whether or not, there were any advaitins belonging to schools other than that of S'aṅkara, and if so, in what respect this particular school differed from them in expounding the Upanishadic teachings.

Professor Radhakrishnan, indeed, who sums up S'aṅkara's life according to the biographical accounts available, observes that 'many of the facts mentioned in these (S'aṅkara-vijayas) are legendary and of doubtful historical value. '

Footnote IP, Vol. II, p. 448.

His own estimate of S'haṅkara is that the latter (S'aṅkara) 'appeared at one and the same time, as an eager champion of the orthodox faith and a spiritual reformer. He tried to bring back the age from the brilliant luxury of the purāṇas to the mystic truth of the Upanishads. ' (ibid. p. 449). Besides Gauḍapāda, the only predecessors of S'aṅkara mentioned by the professor are Bhart hari and Bhartṛprapañca.

ibid., pp. 465-466.

Dr. Dasgupta is quite definite in the matter. He writes " I do not know of any Hindu writer previous to Gauḍapāda who attempted to give an exposition of the monistic doctrine (apart from the Upanishads), either by writing a commentary as did S'aṅkara, or by writing an independent work as did Gauḍapāda, "

HIP, Vol. I, p. 422.

The above is no doubt in deference to the opinion of Thibaut who remarks "S'aṅkara does not on the whole impress one as an author particularly anxious to strengthen his own case by appeals to ancient authorities" (VS. Intro., p. xx) and this implies, perhaps, that S'aṅkara had no tarditional line of previous teachers worth-mentioning. He indeed questions Gough's[1] position when the latter maintains that S'aṅkara is the generally recognized expositor of trueVedāntic doctrine, that that doctrine was handed down by an unbroken series of teachers intervening between him and the Sūtrakāra,and that there existed from the beginning only one Vedanta doctrine, agreeing in all essential points with the doctrine known to us from S'aṅkara's writings.

ibid., pp. xvii xviii

1. A. Gough's Philosophy of the Upanishads, pp. 239 ff

He believes on the other hand, that Ramanuja's System rests on an old and weighty tradition. (ibid., p. xvii) Both Thibaut and Dasgupta are of opinion that the Vṛttikāra criticized by Śaṅkara is Bōdhāyana who wrote an extensive commentary on the sūtras according to the traditon of Ramanuja and that the Vākyakāra Taṅka and the Bhāshyakāra Dramida quoted by Ramanuja were earlier[1] than Śaṅkara and should therefore be equated with Brahmanandin and Dravida who are admitted by the followers of Śaṅkara as preceding their Bhāshyakāra.

Thibaut VS. Intro., pp. xxi and xxii; Dasgupta HIP. Vol. I, p. 433.

Dr. T. R. V. Murthi, however, admits that there were monistic schools of Vedānta before Gauḍapāda and Śaṅkara, though he surmises that the latter two reformulated the Upanishadic ideal in the light of the Mādhyamika and Vijñānavāda dialectic.

CPB., pp. 13, 110-117.

Dr. T.M.P. Mahadevan, the editor and translator of the Sambandha Vārtika of Sureśvara, stands alone among modern scholars in actually recognizing some Vedāntic monistic schools opposed to Śaṅkara's. Anyone who goes through the Vārtika cannot but take cognizance of these schools, since the very subject-matter of the work is a criticism of different views with regard to the teaching of the Upanishads. But as the editor was discussing only the relation between the two Kāndas of the Veda according to Śaṅkara and Sureśvara, perhaps, he failed to notice what exactly was the difference in outlook between Śaṅkara and his opponents, and hence passed by the important question of the existence or non-existence of Śaṅkara's tradition before Gauḍapāda. Nor has he considered the equally important question of the existence or non-existence of non-advaita Vedāntins during the time of, or even antecedent to, Śaṅkara.

1. Examination of Ramanuja's tradition is outside the scope of the present volume of Pratyabhijna. In the meanwhile, I refer the reader to my introduction to the Mandukya Rahasya Vivriti (p. 20) with regard to the Vakyakara and Brahmanandin and Dravidacharya.

It is passing strange that scholars who have been strenuous in their efforts to determine the nature of the main features of the Vedānta anterior to Śaṅkara, should have searched for information in every quarter other than the one which ought to have been the very first to be looked into. What has Śaṅkara himself to say on the subject? Had he a traditional line of ancient teachers to appeal to for his position? Or has he ushered in a revolution in Vedāntic thought by striking out a new line for himself? If so, what induced him to do so, and what were the new ideas he brought into the system? I have shown in the third chapter of the present work, that the nature of ancient traditions other than that of Śaṅkara, has to be inferred only from references to them in Śaṅkara's or Sureśvara's works, since no exegetical literature belonging to these other schools is extant. I have also pointed out that Gauḍapāda whose Kārikas on the Māndūkya are reverently studied by Advaita-Vedāntins till today, has been referred to by Śaṅkara as one 'conversant with the tradition of Vedānta.' Gauḍapāda himself refers to those 'clever in the knowledge of the Vedāntas' (GK., 2-31), thus rendering it highly probable that a school of absolutism akin to that of Gauḍapāda and Śaṅkara did flourish before them. I have also drawn the reader's attention to the anxiety with which Śaṅkara frequently refers to Sampradāya (tradition) in his various works. In my introduction to the Mandūkya Rahasya Vivṛti, I have shown at length that it is not only probable but absolutely certain, that Śaṅkara and Gauḍapāda did have a tradition of teachers of Advaita-absolutism who had been contending to hold their own against other monistic schools.

Intro. MRV., p. 21

Were there any dualistic or non-advaitic schools of Vedānta prior to or during the time of Śaṅkara ? This seems highly improbable. In his Bhāshya on the Brahmasūtras, Śaṅkara says :

अपरे तु वादिनः पारमार्थिकमेव जैवं रूपम् इति मन्यन्ते ; अस्मदीयाश्च केचित् ।

SB., 1-3-19 p. 115

'Other theorizers again, and among them some of ours, are of opinion that the nature of the individual soul as such is real.' Thibaut rightly remarks that the term 'ours' here made use of, can denote only the Aupanishadas or Vedāntins" (Intro. VS., p. xx) and it stands to reason that Śaṅkara was refering to one of the numerous monistic schools which he has frequently taken up for refutation in the Bhāshya. But can non-advaitins also be taken to come under the meaning of that term ? I think not. There is not, in the first place, a single instance of the Vedānta of the type of Ramanuja, Madhva or of any other Vaiṣṅava Vedāntin for that matter, being alluded to by Gauḍapāda, Śaṅkara or even Sureśvara in all their extensive writings. There are, in the second place, express statements to be found in Śaṅkara's writings, which preclude any such probabilty. I subjoin two such extracts :

(१) सर्वोपनिषत्सु हि विज्ञानात्मनः परमात्मना एकत्वप्रत्ययो विधीयत इत्यविप्रतिपत्तिः सर्वेषामुपनिषद्वादिनाम् ॥

"There is no disagreement among all the followers of the Upanishads, that the knowledge of the identity of the individual self with the supreme Self is taught in all the Upanishads.

Bri. Bh., 2-1-20 p. 738.

(२) सम्यग्ज्ञानात् मोक्ष इति सर्वेषां मोक्षवादिनामभ्युपगमः ।

"All those who teach the final release of the soul are agreed that it results from right knowledge."

SB., 2-1-11 p. 193.

There is cumulative evidence, therefore, for concluding that Vedanta upto the time of Gauḍapāda and S'aṅkara, has always been monistic or absolutistic in its nature.

5. How to Determine the System and Method of the Upanishads

I have presumed in the following pages that the Upanishads do contain a very valuable message to mankind and according to S'aṅkara, they are uniformly guided by a well thought-out method in presenting the truth they reveal. And in trying to persuade the reader to adopt my line of thinking, I shall not follow Thibaut and others who have started with the forgone conclusion that the Upanishads have no systematic philosophy to present and yet undertake 'to indicate the outlines of a philosophy of the Upanishads' (VS. Intro., cxv) without making any effort to ascertain, whether or not there is a common method uniformly employed in all the classical Upanishads. Nor shall I suppose that a comparison of the various commentaries on the Upanishads or the Brahmasūtras and the Gītā would be of any avail in this matter. For it is not a question of the majority of opinions on Vedānta or the independent judgment of any single person regarding their comparative merit that we want to decide here. We only wish to know if any clue could be found to the genuine teaching of the Upanishads when we are guided by the oldest traditional commentator available.

Again, we shall, in the first instance, leave the sub-commentaries on S'aṅkara out of consideration for our present purpose. The reason is obvious. Interpreters of S'aṅkara are not agreed, or rather, they are, as often as not, mutually opposed on many essential points of S'aṅkara's system. It may, or may not be true that as Dr. Dasgupta asserts, that in S'aṅkara's works (the commentaries on the Brahma-sūtras and the ten Upanishads) many ideas have been briefly incorporated which as found in S'aṅkara do not appear to be sufficiently clear, but are more intelligible as elaborated by his followers (HIP. Vol. I, p. 430). Anyway, to take the Vedānta system, not as we find it in S'aṅkara but 'as elaborated by his followers' would be only to court confusion and create needless obstacles in our way. I have therefore been satisfied with restricting myself to the classical commentaries of S'aṅkara on the three prasthānas in determining his views on the Upanishadic teachings, the opinions of the most important of his followers being postponed for a detailed consideration in later chapters.

For a similar reason, I have mostly abstained from discussing ideas found in the numerous Prakaraṇas or minor works generally ascribed to S'aṅkara.

These and other principles to be observed in determining the system and method of Vedānta, have been set forth in detail in the first Kāṇḍa (pp.1–10) of the present work.

SECTION TWO

THE SYSTEM AND METHOD OF VEDĀNTA

1. The Signification of the names Vedānta and Upanishad

Vedānta is the system of philosophy contained in the Upanishads. S'haṅkara in explaining the phrase 'साङ्ख्ये कृतान्ते' (Sāṅkhye kṛtānte) in the Gīta writes :

सांख्ये । ज्ञातव्याः पदार्थाः संख्यायन्ते यस्मिन् शास्त्रे तत् सांख्यम् वेदान्तः । .... अतः तस्मिन् आत्मज्ञानार्थे सांख्ये कृतान्ते वेदान्ते ... ॥

Sāṅkhya : The s'astra in which things to be known are expounded is Sankhya, i. e. Vedānta ; so the phrase means 'in that Saṅkhya or Vedānta wherein all action comes to a close.' G. Bh., 18-13, p. 262

The word itself rarely occurs in the classical Upanishads on which S'aṅkara's Bhāshyas are available except for the Svetās·vatara वेदान्ते परमं गुह्यम् (Vedānte paramam guhyam 6-22) and the Muṇḍaka वेदान्त-विज्ञानसुनिश्चितार्थाः (Vedānta-vijñana-suniscitārthah 3-2-6) where according to S'aṅkara, it has to be taken as signifying Upanishadic texts. The word in the latter sense is invariably used in the plural[1] as witness the concluding sentences of the Adhyāsa Bhāshya :

अस्यानर्थहेतोः प्रहाणाय आत्मैकत्वविद्याप्रतिपत्तये सर्वे वेदान्ता आरभ्यन्ते । यथा चायमर्थः सर्वेषां वेदान्तानां तथा वयमस्यां शारीरकमीमांसायां प्रदर्शयिष्यामः ॥

1. Maxmuller (SS., p. 111) draws attention to a curious distinction made in a commentary on the Gautama-Sutras where (3-1-12) Haradatta writes :

उपनिषदः रहस्यब्राह्मणान्याध्यात्मिकानि । तद्व्यतिरिक्ताः आरण्यकभागा वेदान्ताः ॥

thus distinguishing the Upanishads from the Vedanta. Of course this solitary usage need not disturb our position with regard to Shankara's opinion.

" All 'Vedāntas' (or the Upanishads) are begun with a view to destroy this (Adhyāsa, the) cause of all evil, through the attainment of the knowledge of the unity of Ātman. We shall show in this Śārīraka-Mīmāmsā how all Vedāntas have this one purport. "

The name 'Upanishad', however, is found to be used in the classical Upanishads in various senses.

1. "Whichever of these two - Devas or Asuras- take this for their Upanishad ' yatara etadupanishadō bhavishyanti ' (यतर एतदुपनिषदो भविष्यन्ति) they shall be defeated.

" Virōcana went over to the Asuras and to them communicated this Upanishad: the body alone is to be worshipped, is to be served. ' Ch., 8-8-4.

[Here evidently, the word means doctrine.]

2. Its Upanishad is 'the real of the reals'-'tasyōpanishat satyasya satyamiti ' (तस्योपनिषत् सत्यस्य सत्यमिति)

Br., 2-1-20

Śaṅkara explains this as follows : the word denoting a thing is called 'Upanishad', because it takes one nearer to the thing expressed by it.

[So 'Upanishad' here means a name.]

3. "That which one performs with knowledge (vidyayā), with faith (śraddhayā) and with Upanishad - that becomes more efficacious " Ch., 1-1-10.

Śaṅkara explains 'उपनिषदा' (upanishadā) to mean with devoted attention ' yogena yuktah sun ityarthah ' (योगेन युक्तः सन् इत्यर्थः).

4. "Revered sir, please teach me the Upanishad."

Ke., 4-7

Śaṅkara explains that the word 'Upanishad' here refered to is the knowledge of Paramātman and that what follows is only to point out the means to the attainment of that knowledge.

This last is the most important meaning attached to the word as is clear from the Taittir ya which closes the teaching with the words 'iti Upanishad'. Accordingly, S'aṅkara explains it thus :

इति इयम् एवं यथोक्ता अस्यां वल्लयां ब्रह्मविद्या उपनिषत्, सर्वाभ्यो विद्याभ्यः परमरहस्यं दर्शितम् इत्यर्थः । परं श्रेयोऽस्यां निषण्णम् इति ॥

" Thus has been set forth this Brahmavidyā as has been explained in this vallī ; the Upanishad, the most supreme secret of all the Vidyās. This is Upanishad, because the highest good resides in this." Tai.Bh., p. 312

According to S'aṅkara, Upanishad or knowledge of Brahman is so called "because for those that are devoted to it the evils of being conceived, birth, old age etc. are curtailed निशातनात् (nis'ātanāt) or destroyed तदवसादनाद् वा (tadavasādanād vā) or because it brings Brahman very near to the aspirant (Brahmanō va upanigamayitṛtvāt - ब्रह्मणो वा उपनिगमयितृत्वात्) or because the highest good rests in it ' upanishaṇṇam va asyām paramam s'reya iti ' (उपनिषण्णं वा अस्यां परम श्रेय इति)

Tai. Bh., p. 260

Similar derivations of the word may be seen in S'aṅkara's Commentary on the Katha (p. 58) and the Muṇḍaka (p. 142). The literary works treating of Brahma-vidyā are also called the 'Upanishads' only in a secondary sense (K. Bh., p. 58).

2. In what sense is the Upanishad a Secret ?

Owing to the cicumstance, perhaps, that the Upanishads have been called by an alternative name 'rahasya' (secret doctrine) Deussen infers that the word Upanishad comprehends, within the range of its connotation, the idea of secrecy also. He says (PU., p. 16) that the word occurs with three distinct meanings, 'secret word', 'secret text', and 'secret import'. And upon this basis, or perhaps to subtantiate this interpretation, he propounds the theory that the Upanishadic doctrine was cultivated primarily not by brahmañas but in a narrow circle of kshatriyas; that it was studiously withheld from the Brāhmaṇas, by whom it was first adopted in later times (ibid., p. 19). He further concludes with a postulate: "We may therefore assume that the doctrine of the Ātman as the first principle of the universe .... was fostered and progressively devoleped by the kshatriyas in opposition to the principles of the Brahmanical ritual; whence the new knowledge was expressed in brief words or formulas, intelligible only to the initiated, such as 'tadvanam', 'tajjalān', 'satyasya satyam', 'sāṁyadvāma', 'vāmanī', 'bhāmanī', etc. A formula of this kind was then called an 'Upanishad' inasmuch as the condition of its communication and explanation was the absence of publicity. Such formulas were naturally accompanied by oral explanations which also were kept secret, and from these were gradually developed the earliest texts that bore the name of Upanishad." (ibid p. 20).

This plausible theory, however tempting to students of historical research, we shall ignore for our present purpose. It will be noticed that most of the formulas adduced by Deussen relate to the Upasanās (meditations) and as such do not really pertain to the principal teaching or the Ātman doctrine of the Upanishads, which does not always involve meditation. This division of the Upanishadic texts into two classes, we shall take up for consideration later on. For the present it will be enough to go into the question as to how far the Upanishads enjoin secrecy to be observed in the transmission of their teachings. There is no doubt that certain qualifications are pre-supposed to be quite necessary for an aspirant to the knowledge of Ātman-witness the Kena : 'tasyai tapō damah karmeti pratisthā तस्यै तपो दमः कर्मेति प्रतिष्ठा 4-8'; the Katha : 'nāviratō duscaritānnāśānto nasamāhitah नाविरतो दुश्चरितान्नाशान्तो नासमाहितः 1-2-24'; the Praśna : 'bhūya eva tapasā brahmacharyeṇa shraddhayā saṁvatsaram saṁvatsyatha भूय एव तपसा ब्रह्मचर्येण श्रद्धया संवत्सरं संवत्स्यथ 1-2'; the Muṇḍaka : 'tasmai sa vidwānupasannāya samyak-praśantacittāya śamānvitāyā तस्मै स विद्वानुपसन्नाय सम्यक् प्रशान्तचित्ताय शमान्विताय 2-13'; the Taittirīya : 'tapasā brahma vijijñāsasva तपसा ब्रह्म विजिज्ञासस्व 3-2' and the Chāndogya : 'tasmai mṛdita-kashāyāya तस्मै मृदितकषायाय' – but these qualifications never imply that the doctrine is to be jealously guarded from any section of people. On the other hand, the Bṛhadāraṇyaka expressly states that whosoever –whether among the gods, the ṛshis or men–realizes his identity with Brahman reaps the fruit of that knowledge (Br.,1-4-10). There is of course the orthodox initiation ceremony (Upanayanam) to be gone through before the doctrine-knowledge or upāsanā – is taught, whence it follows that only the three higher castes were given this teaching. The Brahmasūtras (VS., 1-3-36) therefore decide that śūdras are excluded from this privilege. Śaṅkara, however, relying on the Mahābhārata and other smṛtis, observes that " in the case of Vidura, Dharmavyādha and others (who do not belong to any one of the first three varṇas) we cannot deny that they got the fruit of Brahma-knowledge owing to the effects of a previous birth, since the latter invariably brings about its fruit. Moreover, all the four castes are declared eligible for the knowledge of the itihāsa and the purāṇās, in the smṛti 'he shall teach the four Varṇas' (M.Bh. Śanti, 327-49). Only it has been decided here that the Sūdras are not entitled to get knowledge through the medium of the Vedas. "

SB., 1-3-38, p. 539.

Nevertheless, knowledge of Brahman as well as meditations taught in the Upanishads or the Gita, has been rightly designated 'secret' (rahasya) in the sense that it is not accessible to everyone that is qualified to study the Vedas, inasmuch as it relates to the innermost self of man. The following quotations will bear this out :

(१) तत्रैतस्मिन् अद्वैतप्रकरणे अभ्युदयसाधनानि उपासनान्युच्यन्ते । कैवल्य-संनिकृष्टफलानि च अद्वैतात् ईषद्विकृतब्रह्मविषयाणि 'मनोमयः प्राणशरीरः' इत्यादीनि ; कर्मसमृद्धिफलानि च कर्माङ्गसंबन्धीनि । रहस्यसामान्यात्, मनोवृत्तिसामान्याच्च ॥

Ch. Bh., Intro.

(२) इदं तु ते गुह्यतमं प्रवक्ष्याम्यनसूयवे ॥ G. 9-1.

(३) सर्वगुह्यतमं भूयः शृणु मे परमं वचः ॥ G. 18-64.

It is clear that the orthodox Vedāntins regard each one of the Upanishads as well as Brahma-knowledge as an open secret. It is closed only to those who cannot or will not take the trouble of entering into the interior spiritual realm.

3. In what sense do the Upanishads contain a System of Philosophy ?

I think that the reader had better be forewarned as to what I mean when I say that the Upanishads point to a definite system of philosophy. It is well-known that etymologically the word philosophy means love of wisdom leading to the search for it. So interpreted, it is best represented by the Saṁskṛt word jijñāsā, or anveshaṇā ; compare the Chandogya text sō'nveshtavyah, sa vijijñāsitavyah, (सोऽन्वेष्टव्यः स विजिज्ञासितव्यः Ch., 8-1-1). It now means knowledge resulting from the search of the general principles-elements, powers or causes and laws - as explaining facts and existences. A western writer says that it is " the product of human thought, acting upon the data given by the world without, or the world within, and eliciting from these data principles, laws and system. " (H. B. Smith, Faith and Philosophy essay i, p. 5). In this sense of course, Vedānta is no philosophy, for one of the fundamental principles adopted here is ' naishā tarkeṇa matirāpaneyā - नैषा तर्केण मतिरापनेया ' (this knowledge is not attainable through speculation, K. 1-2-9).

' The object matter of Philosophy ', it has been observed, 'may be distinguished as God or nature or man. But underlying all our enquiries into any of these departments, there is a first philosophy which seeks to ascertain the grounds or principles of knowledge and the causes of all things. Hence philosophy has been said to be the science of causes and principles. It is the investigation of these principles on which all knowledge and all being ultimately rest" (K. F. Vocab. Philos., p. 388). It will be noted that the Upanishads do treat of God, Nature and man - and all other creatures for that matter - and from this point of view, may be said to cover the entire field of ' the objective matter of philosophy ' as herein described. It may not lay claim to be the ' the first philosophy ' as seeking to ascertain the principles of knowledge and causes of all things, since it is no speculation, but nevertheless, in its own way, it does present very definite ideas as to the nature and limitations of discursive knowledge no less than the ultimate cause of all things. If the reader is liberal enough to bear with this slight difference, he will be willing to bring even Vedānta under the connotation of the word philosophy.

But is there a system of philosophy here? A number of suggestions seem to be thrown out in these writings out of which later interpreters try to evolve something like a system. But where do we find a connected account of either knowledge or being in all these writings? Says Thibaut: "If anything is evident even on a cursory review of the Upanishads ..... it is that they do not constitute a systematic whole. They themselves, the older ones, give the most unmistakable indications on that point" (VS., ciii). This sceptical view is quite justified so long as we choose to ramble in these woods without a guide. We shall see presently how, according to Śaṅkara, the Upanishads do present their teachings systematically. But what is system itself, in the first place? This is how the dictionary defines it: "Orderly combination or arrangement as of particulars or elements into a whole; especially such combination according to some rational principle or organic idea giving it unity and completeness (The New Standard Dictionary). This definition may not wholly apply to the Vedānta of the Upanishads, since it is not a rational system, as has been already admitted. But here is a more general description: "System is an organised body of truth, or truths (K. F. Vocab. Philos., p. 505). Now the meaning of this description may be taken to be wide enough to justify the view that the Vedānta philosophy is systematic inasmuch as it brings everything under one and the same idea, that of Paramārtha or Reality and inasmuch as all truths are comprehended by the one grand truth Samyagjnānam (सम्यग्ज्ञानम्) that is revealed by one and the same method of 'Adhyāropa-apavāda'. I shall now proceed to explain in the following pages what I mean by this brief statement.

SECTION THREE

THE VEDĀNTA DOCTRINE OF REALITY

1. Harmony of Upanishadic Teaching how discovered

I have said that while Vedānta as expounded by the Upanishads may not be philosophy as generally understood in the west, it nevertheless has very definite views concerning being, knowledge and values. While it is not a closely reasoned system attempting to prove everyone of its doctrines, it none the less is in possession of a comprehensive view of reality in all its aspects, a view based upon universal intuition. It has also a traditional method of suggesting the view to the earnest enquirer, who has the necessary qualification to assimilate the truth. To recognize this method is to recognize the harmony of all Upanishadic teachings. Instead of following the modern critics who stand aghast on looking at some of the apparent inconsistencies or certain unscientific statements made in individual cases, the earnest student will do well to be guided by traditional interpreters like Śaṅkara and recognize this method. There is much truth in what Dr. Radhrkrishnan writes about these sacred writings. " Notwithstanding the variety of authorship and the period of time covered by the composition of these half-poetical and half-philosophical treatises, there is a unity of purpose, a vivid sense of spiritual reality in them all, which become clear and distinct as we descend the stream of time. " (IP., p. 139)

2. The Traditional Method of Vedānta

And what is this method which, recognized, transforms the all-seeming chaos into cosmos with regard to these sacred writings ? Śaṅkara was perhaps the first after Gauḍapāda to refer to it in the Gīta Bhāshya by name. That its employment for revealing the nature of reality was known long before him, is disclosed by a quotation of his in that commentary :

तथा हि संप्रदायविदां वचनम् 'अध्यारोपापवादाभ्यां निष्प्रपञ्चं प्रपञ्च्यते' इति ।

"Accordingly, knowers of the traditional method have declared 'That which is devoid of all distinctions and details is explained through deliberate superimposition and rescission' " (G. Bh. 12-13). Superimposition (adhyārōpa) literally means laying something on something else, falsely imputing the nature or property of something to something else. It is a postulate of Vedānta that, owing to a natural tendency of the human mind, a beginningless super-imposition called avidyā compels us all to look upon Reality as infected with manifold distinctions. Now in order to educate the mind to interpret Reality as it is, the Upanishads uniformly employ, the aforesaid method of adhyārōpāpavāda or deliberate superimposition or provisional ascription and subsequent rescission or abrogation. An example taken from the Gīta will illustrate the principle :

सर्वतः पाणिपादं तत् सर्वतोऽक्षिशिरोमुखम् ।
सर्वतः श्रुतिमल्लोके सर्वमावृत्य तिष्ठति ॥
सर्वेन्द्रियगुणाभासं सर्वेन्द्रियविवर्जितम् ।
असक्तं सर्वभृच्चैव निर्गुणं गुणभोक्तृ च ॥[1]

G. 13-13, 14.

1. These shlokas are a verbatim reproduction of Svetashwatara III-16-17 except for the second half of the second shloka.

In the first of the above two slokas, Reality or Brahman is said to possess hands and feet, eyes, heads, faces and ears on all sides; whereas in the second, it is declared to be devoid of all senses even while it appears to be able to perform all sensory functions. S'a kara observes that " the special features noticed in the kshetrajña (the Self) owing to the limiting conditions caused by the different forms of kshetra (the body etc.) being unreal, have been rescinded in the previous sloka, and kshetrajña has been taught to be realized as neither being nor non-being. But here (in sloka 13), even the unreal nāture manifested through the limiting conditions, has been treated as though it were the property of the knowable just to bring its existence home, and hence the knowable kshetrajña is spoken of as 'possessed of hands and feet etc., everywhere'. Accordingly, there is the well-known saying of the knowers of tradition : 'That which is devoid of all details is set forth in detail through deliberate superimposition and rescission.' Hands and feet and the rest which seem to be limbs of each and every body, owe their respective functions to the presence of the power of consciousness inherent in the Ātman to be known. So, they are evidential marks indicating the presence of Ātman and are therefore spoken of as pertaining to it in a secondary sense " (G. Bh. 13-13, p. 204). S'aṅkara means to say that Brahman is first brought to our notice by the S'ruti as the one self of us all, which functions through all our senses. The self seizes things with our hands, walks with our feet, sees through our eyes and hears through our ears, as it were. This way of describing it, is for convincing us of its undeniable existence. Once we recognize this, the s'ruti revokes the wrong ascription of sensory acts, to enable us to interpret Reality as it is, as the one Universal Self. The ascription of the sensory activities was merely a device to familiarize our mind with the existence of the Self, very much like the temporary scaffolding used for the erection of a building, to be altogether removed after that object is accomplished. Accordingly Śaṅkara summarizes the purport of the second ślōka thus :

उपाधिभूतपाणिपादादीन्द्रियाध्यारोपात् , ज्ञेयस्य तद्वत्ता शङ्का माभूदित्ययमर्थः श्लोकारम्भः ॥

"Lest it be supposed that this Brahman to be known is really possessed of the senses such as hands and feet etc., just because they have been imputed to it, the next verse is begun."

3. Special Varieties of the Vedāntic Method

I have shown in greater detail, especially in the third chapter (pp. 26-117) of the present work, how this one scheme works in all the modes of approach employed in the Upanishads to lead the aspirant to the intuition of Reality. Reality as such transcends all our concepts of the objective world, for all conceptual reasoning pre-supposes the fundamental super-imposition or adhyāsa already (p.41) mentioned. Hence it follows that the only legitimate method of realizing it is to wade through this super-imposition. Hence the concepts of cause and effect, the universal and the individual, the knower and the known, the self and and its limiting sheaths, consciousness and its states-these and other general notions like them, are all discussed in the Upanishads merely to teach the seeker how to transcend all such distinctions and attain what is forever attained, to wit, union with Reality. This can be verified by noticing the fact that in each one of such discussions, the Upanishads invariably rescind the initial ascription at the close.

Thus in the Chandogya, after positing Being or Brahman as the cause of Fire, Water and Earth – the primordial elements which produce the world, Uddālaka concludes :

एवमेव खलु सोम्यान्नेन शुङ्गेनापो मूलमन्विच्छद्भिः सोम्य शुङ्गेन तेजो मूलमन्विच्छ तेजसा सोम्य शुङ्गेन सन्मूलमन्विच्छ सन्मूलाः सोम्येमाः सर्वाः प्रजाः सदायतनाः सत्प्रतिष्ठाः ॥ छा. ६-८-४.

" Through the off-shoot of food (the Earth) my dear son, seek out the root Water, through the off-shoot of Water, my dear son, seek out the root Fire, and through the off-shoot of Fire, my dear son, seek out the Real. All these creatures, my dear son, have the Sat (Being or Brahman) for their source, the Sat for their abode, the Sat for their dissolving goal. " (Ch. 6-8-4) That is to say, there is nothing that is not born from Brahman, that does not subsist in Brahman, that is not finally dissolved in it. So then the substance of all things created is Brahman only. Accordingly Uddālaka in this Upanishad, reiterates this one statement at every step of his teaching "Aitadātmyam idam sarvam tat satyam sa ātmā tat twamasi s'wetaketo" ऐतदात्म्यमिदं सर्वं तत्सत्यं स आत्मा तत् त्वमसि श्वेतकेतो । That is why too he illustrates what he means by citing clay etc, where he emphasizes that the material cause such as clay alone is real while its effect is unreal, its name being a mere play of words (vācārambhaṇam वाचारम्भणम्) That what is meant to be proved is the unreality of the so-called effect as distinct from the cause or rather the sole reality of the cause as the substance of its effects, is evident from texts like the one already quoted from the Chandogya.

यदग्ने रोहितं रूपं तेजसस्तद्रूपं यच्छुक्लं तदपां यत्कृष्णं तदन्नस्यापागादग्नेरग्नित्वं वाचारम्भणं विकारो नामधेयं त्रीणि रूपाणीत्येव सत्यम् ॥ Ch. 6 4 1

It is clear that fire, a product of the original non-tripartite bhūtas after being mentally resolved into the original factors, is here stated to become 'no fire (apāgāt agneragnitvam), modification being only a name arising from words, and the three colours alone being real. Accordingly Śaṅkara explains "Before the dawn of the discriminating knowledge of the three colours, you entertained the notion that it was fire; that notion of fire as well as the name fire, has now gone away." We thus see that the narration of creation was intended only to show that the world as an effect is merely a name 'constructed by speech' and that essentially it is nothing other than Brahman. This interpretation is quite in consonance with Bādarāyaṇa's Sūtra: "It is not other than the cause, as can be seen from the texts like the one teaching ārambhaṇa, the construction (of the effect) by speech." (VS., 2-1 14)

1. Thibaut, however, has a different interpretation to offer: "We including Uddalaka may surely say that all earthen pots are in reality nothing but earth – the earthen pot being a special modification (vikara) of clay which has a name of its own- without thereby committing ourselves to the doctrine that the change of form, which a lump of clay undergoes when being fashioned into a pot, is not real but a mere baseless illusion" (VS., p. cxviii); "What is capable of being proved and manifestly meant to be proved" he remarks, "is merely that this whole world has Brahman for its causal substance, just as clay is the causal matter of every earthen pot" (ibid.)

I fail to see whence he gets his clue for 'the causal substance' and how, on his interpretation, he justifies the solemn repetition of the statements 'Vacharambhanam vikaro namadheyam वाचारम्भणं विकारो नामधेयम्); and 'mrittiketyeva satyam', (मृत्तिकेत्येव सत्यम्) ; 'apagadagneragnitvam (अपागादग्नेरग्नित्वम्) – etc., where the reality of the cause and the unreality of the effect are equally emphasized.

Of course, S'aṅkara never meant to say that pots and other modifications of clay are not there when we see and use them for practical purposes, or that our senses deceive us when they report that there are such objective existences. But nobody would venture to assert that these so-called modifications are distinct from clay and have reality of their own apart from that of clay of which they are different forms. From this point of view, then, the world we see is no 'baseless illusion' for it has for its basis the original Being(Sat) or Brahman with which it is essentially one (aitadtāmyam idam sarvam ऐतदात्म्यमिदं सर्वम्). And we shall never be doing injustice to the essential reality of the world when we declare with Angiras of the Muṇḍaka :

अधश्चोर्ध्वं च प्रसृतं ब्रह्मैवेदं विश्वमिदं वरिष्ठम् ॥

"All this spread out before us, behind, to the right and to the left, above and below, is but the immortal Brahman, all this universe is the Supreme Brahman ". Mu. 2-2 1

As S'aṅkara sums up, "The notion of non-Brahman is merely avidyā just like the notion of a serpent in a rope, Brahman alone being the Highest Reality. Such is the teaching of the Vedas. "

This rather protracted discussion of causality and creation will be enough, I hope, to illustrate the method of adhyāropa and apavāda (imputation and rescission). The Upanishads do not undertake to examine the concept of causality as such and to pronounce their judgment in the matter. They rather take up the concept as accepted in the empirical world and utilize it to teach us that the real nature of Brahman is above the notions of cause and effect.

Similarly, the concept of the universal is applied to Brahman to warn us against taking it as one among several individuals, and then this ascription is cancelled (37).[1] It is presented as the knower of all just to dissuade us from treating it as an object and when this end is achieved, Brahman is shown to transcend the distinction of knower and known also (38). The doctrine of the five sheaths (Panca-Kos·as), is only to obviate the mental tendency to regard the body, the vital principle, and other objective existences as the self and after this is done, the real Self is revealed as transcending all these sheaths (39). And the method of Avasthās or the three states of consciousness, has a similar aim. The individual self seemingly experiencing the three states, is step by step shown to be identical with the Universal Self in its three aspects of Viraj, Hiranyagarbha, and Avyakṛtatman and finally revealed in its true nature as the Turiya or the Secondless Supreme Self transcending all the states.

4. The Basic Super-imposition

These and other varieties of the 'adhyāropa-apavāda' method, have to be systematically graduated in order to appreciate its value as a pedagogical instrument in the hands of a skilful teacher of Vedānta. I have attempted in the body of the present work (20) to indicate the general line of procedure adopted in Vedāntic writings and its significance. While Brahman is devoid of all distinguishing features and, as the very self of us all, is eternally attained, some texts temporarily superimpose attainability on it and from that position deny that it can be attained through any means other than knowledge. Some texts superimpose knowability and deny that any other thing is knowable in the real senseof the word. Some other texts presume that it is a knower and hence unknowable, while other texts assert that, being the witnessing principle in us, it cannot be considered to be a knower. Yet other texts deny that it can ever be described in positive terms. Some texts again, say that Brahman is known only through instruction from the Vedas or a teacher, and hence beyond the reach of perception and other means of knowledge, while other texts aver that Brahman being self-evident, is no object of speech or thought. In short, the very soul of this method consists in pre-supposing some characteristic as pertaining to Brahman, just to discard its correlate or opposite and then annulling the pre-supposition itself.

1. The numbers within brackets, in this para, indicate the corresponding paragraphs in the body of the present work.

Now, the Upanishads teach that there is a basic super-imposition called avidyā which is the root of all the various particular superimpositions that obtain in empirical life, and hence that all evils of life can be uprooted by seeing through this fundamental error and intuiting Brahman as it is. This innate error in the human mind as well as the knowledge of Brahman attainable through intuition are refered to in the following s'ruti : "दूरमेते विपरीते विषूची अविद्या या च विद्येति ज्ञाता" "These two, the error of Avidyā and that which is known as Vidyā are far apart from each other, mutually exclusive, and proceed in opposite directions ' (K. 1-2-4).

S'aṅkara explains in the Introduction to his Sūtra-Bhāshya that this avidyā consists in the mutual superimposing of the self and the not-self, and a mistaken transference of their properties to each other. This avidyā is not an event in time or place and therefore, not to be likened to temporary individual errors that men are liable to commit, as for instance, when they mistake a rope for a snake or the mother-of-pearl for silver. It is rather an inherent natural tendency on the part of the human mind to fuse these two, the Self and the Not-Self, into one and form the fundamental concepts of 'me' and 'mine'. It is this basic error of the ego which is responsible for all the processes of thinking and experiences in ordinary life. It is now clear how Vedānta is primarily concerned with the exposing of this basic error and not with offering pramāṇas or means of proof for its propositions, nor yet with determining the nature of the objects of our knowledge. No pramāṇas are adduced in all the Upanishads to prove the existence of Reality and no arguments put forward for establishing its nature. In fact, S'aṅkara tells us, they rather aim at demolishing all talk of pramāṇa and prameya, means of proof and objects of knowledge, this distinction being, in their view, only due to avidyā or primary ignorance.

यत्र हि द्वैतमिव भवति तदितर इतरं पश्यति तदितर इतरं जिघ्रति तदितर इतरं रसयते तदितर इतरमभिवदति तदितर इतरं मनुते तदितर इतरं स्पृशति तदितर इतरं विजानाति यत्र त्वस्य सर्वमात्मैवाभूत् तत्केन कं पश्येत् तत् केन कं जिघ्रेत् तत् केन कं रसयेत् तत् केन कमभिवदेत् तत् केन कं शृणुयात् तत् केन कं मन्वीत तत् केन कं स्पृशेत् तत् केन कं विजानीयात् ॥

"For where there is dualiy, as it were, there one sees something, one smells something, one tastes something, one says something, one hears something, one thinks something, one touches something, one knows something. But when to this (knower of Brahman) everything has become the Self, then what can one possibly see and with what (sense)? What can one smell and with what ? .... " Br., 4-5-15

This text evidently avers that all details of knowledge, the distinction of the knower, means of knowledge, as well as the objects of knowledge and the resultant knowledge, belong to the sphere of seeming duality and not to the transcendental Ātman, for "that is the Ātman described as 'not this, not that' (sa esha neti netyātmā स एष नेति नेत्यात्मा)". Even the śruti is considered a pramāṇa only figuratively. Śaṅkara says

'अत्र पिताऽपिता भवति' इत्युपक्रम्य 'वेदा अवेदाः' (बृ ४-३-२२) इति वचनात्, इत्यत एवास्माभिः श्रुतेरप्यभावः प्रबोधे ।....नन्वहमीश्वर एवोक्तः श्रुत्या । यद्येवं प्रतिबुद्धोऽसि नास्ति कस्यचिदप्रबोधः ॥

"We do accept the position that even the śruti ceases to be at the dawn of knowledge, since there is a text which declares that 'the Vedas are no Vedas' (Br., 4-3-22)in the Absolute .... If you are thus awakened to the truth, there is none to whom avidyā pertains." SB., 4-1-3, p. 465.

" न हि आत्मस्वरूपाधिगमे सति पुनः प्रमाणप्रमेयव्यवहारः संभवति । प्रमातृत्वं हि आत्मनो निवर्तयति, अन्त्यं प्रमाणम् । निवर्तयदेव च अप्रमाणीभवति स्वप्नकालप्रमाणमिव प्रबोधे ॥

"There can be no talk of the distinction of the means of knowledge and the object thereof when one realizes the nature of the Self, for the final proof (the śruti) removes the knowing nature of the knower and while so doing, becomes no longer a means of knowledge, much in the same way as the apparent means of knowledge in a dream ceases to be such, so soon as one awakes." G. Bh., 2-69.

It is thus clear that by employing this method of superimposition and rescission, the Upanishads lift us above the sphere of both knowing and being at one stroke, as they reveal the eternal transcendental nature of our true Self.

5. The Significance of Negation in Vedānta

Failure to recognize this method in all its bearings, has led modern scholars to interpret the negative propositions in the Upanishads according to their own predilections. Thus, for instance, Deussen believes that Brahman is described as 'neti neti' because it is beyond time, place and causality. He is convinced, however, "that those ancient times were frequently unable to formulate the idea of a spaceless, timeless, causeless existence in its abstract simplicity " as Kant has done in recent times. PU., p. 150.

Radhakrishnan thinks that the negative definitions are intended to point out the inadequacy of the positive attributes as applied to the highest. IP., 178, Dasgupta is nearer the truth when he says "The way to indicate it is thus by neti, neti, it is not this, it is not this. We cannot describe by any positive context which is always limited by conceptual thought. " He also repeats Deussen's view when he remarks "He (the Ātman) is independent of all limitations of space, time and cause which rule all that is objectively presented and therefore the empirical universe (IP., 45)". The Professor's position, however, is that "they (the Vedic poets) had only a dim and dreamy vision of it in the deep craving of the souls which could not be translated into permanent terms (ibid., p. 44) ".

The reader who has followed our account of the Vedāntic method, will readily see that neither the inability to formulate the idea of Brahman, nor 'the dim and dream vision of the ṛshis, nor yet the inadequacy of positive attributes, was responsible for the adoption of the so-called 'negative method' in the Upanishads. In the first place, Brahman as our own

Ātman or Self is never in need of any definition or proof for its being known, for it is the one light, with the help of which all human activities are conducted. As the śruti says

'आत्मैवास्य ज्योतिर्भवतीत्यात्मनैवायं ज्योतिषास्ते पल्ययते कर्म कुरुते विपल्येतीति'

'The Self alone serves as one's light, it is solely through the light of the Self that one sits, goes out, works and returns'(Br.,4-3-6), 'It is the light within the mind'(Br., 4-3-7), 'Here in dream, the Purusha is his own light' (Br., 4-3-9), '(Here in deep sleep, he is) transparent like water, the one witness without a second'(Br.,4-3-9). Surely, this is no 'dim and dreamy vision' of the Self? In the second place, it is impossible to define in words or to formulate an idea of Brahman, for the simple reason that it is beyond speech and mind. (yatō vācō nivartante aprāpya manasā saha यतो वाचो निवर्तन्ते अप्राप्य मनसा सह Tai., 2-9), being the enlightener of both. In the words of the Upanishad, it is 'the mind of the mind, and the speech of speech' (manasō manō, yad vāchō ha vācham मनसो मनो यद् वाचो ह वाचम् Ke., 1-2).

Why then do the Upanishad ṛshis use the 'negative' or rather, the negation method? Let us listen to Śaṅkara:

तस्मात् बाह्याकारभेदबुद्धिनिवृत्तिरेव आत्मस्वरूपावलम्बनकारणम् । न ह्यात्मा नाम कश्चित् कदाचित् अप्रसिद्धः प्राप्यो हेय उपादेयो वा । अप्रसिद्धे हि तस्मिन् आत्मनि सर्वाः प्रवृत्तयो व्यर्थाः प्रसज्येरन् ॥

"Therefore it is that the abolition of the concepts of the several external object-forms, is the only means of resorting to the true nature of the Self. For what is called the Self is not something unknown to anyone, to be newly reached, to be got rid of or acquired at any time. Indeed, if that were altogether unknown, all efforts for one's own benefit would be meaningless."

G. Bh., 18-50, p. 281

Again,

योऽसावुपनिषत्स्वेवाधिगतः स्वप्रकरणस्थोऽनन्यशेषः, नासौ नास्ति नाधिगम्यत इति वा शक्यं वदितुम् । 'स एष नेति नेत्यात्मा' इत्यात्मशब्दात्. आत्मनश्च प्रत्याख्यातुमशक्यत्वात् । य एव निराकर्ता तस्यैवात्मत्वात् ॥

"Of that non-transmigratory Purusha, to be known exclusively through the Upanishads, that is, Brahman altogether different from the four classes of substances -to be produced etc...., which is taught in a context of its own, and not as subordinate to something else, of that Purusha, it is impossible to say that He is not existent or cannot be known since there is the word Ātman (Self) in the text, now this is the Self (already) described as 'not this, not this', and since the Self cannot be denied inasmuch as the denier himself is the Self."

SB, 1-1-4, p. 19-20.

One more quotation :

अविषयत्वे ब्रह्मणः शास्त्रयोनित्वानुपपत्तिरिति चेत् । न । अविद्याकल्पितभेदनिवृत्तिपरत्वात् शास्त्रस्य । न हि शास्त्रमिदंतया विषयभूतं ब्रह्म प्रतिपिपादयिषति, किं तर्हि प्रत्यगात्मत्वेन अविषयतया प्रतिपादयत्, अविद्याकल्पितं वेद्यवेदितृवेदनादिभेदमपनयति ॥

"If it be objected that in case Brahman is no object (of speech or mind) the Śāstra cannot possibly be the means of its knowledge, we say no; for the Śāstra only purports to remove all distinctions fictitiously constructed by Avidyā. (To explain) : the śāstra does not intend to teach Brahman- particularly as this or that by objectifying it, but only to teach that it is no object at all being one's own inner Self and thus to remove distinctions like that of the knowable, knower and knowledge, distinctions fictitiously constructed by avidyā."

SB., 1-1-14, p. 16.

It is obvious from the above that the method of negation is adopted, not because of the inability of the ṛshis to teach or form a true concept of Brahman, not because words and concepts are inadequate to present the true nature of Brahman, but because the very nature of Brahman as the self-luminous light of the witnessing consciousness in us all, desiderates this one method to the exclusion of all empirical modes of teaching or knowing. And this method reveals the Self-revealed Brahman by merely removing the imaginary veil of wrong thought-constructs thrown over it by avidyā.

We can now understand the significance of the Upanishadic negation. The Upanishads constitute the only revelation of the universal witnessing Ātman as distinct from the ego known to the Mimamsakas and the rationalist philosophers of India. (SB., 1-1-4, p. 20) and Brahman as this witness or Ātman in all beings, uniform, one without a second, eternal and unchanging, can never be objectified in any manner, since it is the unseen seer, the unheard hearer, the unthought thinker, the unknown knower' and 'there is no other seer, no other hearer, no other thinker, no other knower than this one' (Br., 3-8-11).The negation of empirical properties in it, therefore, can neither imply the absence of something which enjoys its being elsewhere, nor the affirmation of something else different from or opposed to the one negated. It is solely intended to disuade one from attributing any reality to the properties imagined by ignorance. This ignorance or avidyā itself, again, is the basic super-imposition which is responsible for its own appearance as well as that of all other derivative super-impositions issuing forth from it. Brahman or the absolute Reality ever remains the same, unaffected by the superimposition of avidyā or its removal. It is for this reason hat the śruti utilizes differen t devices suited to remov e particular impositions and this accounts not only for the special instances of the 'Adhyārōpa - apavāda' method, but also for the different modes of negation employed in different s'rutis. A teacher who has realized Brahman as his own Self, can therefore select any one of these or any other similar devices suited to the requirements of his individual disciple, the only test of the negation being that it works and leads the seeker to the intuition of the Real. It is important to remember that it is not the seeker who negates the superimposed appearance. For he is not conscious of reality as such at the time of enquiry, and no amount of critical reflection would take him to the truth so long as his mind is extrovert. It is the S'ruti or the Acārya, preferably the latter, that gives him the inward lead, and in doing so the s'ruti or the guru consciously uses one or more of the aforesaid devices suited to the seeker's frame of mind. It is not a question of listening to an external teaching, and then using some logical dialectic to remove misconceptions. The s'ruti or the teacher merely gives an inward turn to the mind of the seeker, who under the guide of the former, attends to the nature of his own self and by a gradual process of co-ordinating his partial intuitions as suggested by the s'ruti or teacher, he finally rests in the intuition of Brahman after abolishing the superimpositions.[1] But how is the seeker to follow the lead of the s'astra or

1. Prof. T.R.V. Murti seems to miss the point when he writes "In the Vedanta negation applies to becoming and difference, which are falsely ascribed to Pnre Being" (CPB., p. 158). For Reality or Brahman is neither being as opposed to becoming, nor one as opposed to many. Negation in shrutis applies as we have seen, to all vikalpas, including the empirical being and number. Compare the Gita 'Na sat-tannasaducyate न सत्तन्नासदुच्यते' and a saying ascribed to Shankara 'na chaikam dvitiyam kutah syat' न चैकं द्वितीयं कुतः स्यात् ॥

the teacher? Does he already know Brahman before he strips it of false ascriptions in accordance with the suggestion of his guide? The answer is both yes and no. He does know it as his self. 'sarvasya ātmatvācca Brahmāstitvā-prasidhih सर्वस्य आत्मत्वाच्च ब्रह्मास्तित्वप्रसिद्धिः SB., 1-1-1, p. 6). He does not entirely rely on either the teacher or the śāstra, for either of these can only suggest to him what is already in him. As Śaṅkara puts it 'vacanam nāma yathābhūtasya arthasya jñāpakam na avidyamānasya kartṛ वचनं नाम यथाभूतस्य ज्ञापकम्, न अविद्यमानस्य कर्तृ (Tai. Intro., p. 276), a text can only make known anything as it is; it cannot create anything de novo. And in the case of one's own self, ever-known and self-effulgent, there is nothing to be made known by positive definition, and hence there can be only the removal of false notions created by avidyā.

It is sometimes supposed that mere negation cannot give us complete knowledge of a thing unless our false judgment is replaced by a positively correct one. It is not enough to know that I misjudge a thing to be a snake; it is necessary to complete it by knowing positively what the thing I perceive is in its true nature. Hence, it is urged, that positive Upanishadic statements defining Brahman are more forceful than negative ones. But the argument ignores the fact that Brahman as our own self is in no need of enlightenment as to its existence or nature. Moreover as Śaṅkara observes the only function of knowledge is to remove the ignorance which envelops the true nature of a thing:

न हि क्वचित् साक्षात् वस्तुधर्मस्य अपोढ्री दृष्टा कर्त्री वा विद्या। अविद्यायास्तु सर्वत्रैव निवर्तिका दृश्यते। तथा इहापि अब्रह्मत्वम् असर्वत्वं च अविद्याकृतमेव निवर्त्यतां ब्रह्मविद्यया, न तु पारमार्थिकं वस्तु कर्तुं निवर्तयितुं वा अर्हति ब्रह्मविद्या॥

'Knowledge has been never noticed either to remove or to create actually the property of anything. It is found, however, to destroy ignorance in every case. So here also let us accept that knowledge of Brahman removes the non-Brahmic nature and limited nature created by ignorance only, and not that knowledge of Brahman can create or remove an actually existent thing.' Br. Bh., 1-4-10, p. 669). Indeed, we are said to know more and more of a thing in proportion to the removal of ignorance concerning it. Sankara therefore humorously remarks :

येषां पुनस्तमोऽपनयव्यतिरेकेण फलाधिगमे प्रमाणं व्याप्रियते, तेषां छेद्यावयव-संबन्धवियोगव्यतिरेकेण अन्यतरावयवेऽपि छिदिर्व्याप्रियत इत्युक्तं स्यात् ॥

"Those who affirm that knowledge, besides removing ignorance, enables one positively 'to know' the thing itself, would be affirming that the act of cutting - besides severing the connection of the parts of a log - operates on each of the parts also." Ma.Bh., 7, p. 187.

6. Application of the Negation Method

A study of the different forms of negation employed in the Śrutis, would reveal, how the one method of super-imposition and rescission operates in all the specific instances.

1. "It is the one that never moves and is yet swifter than mind. The senses never overtake it, for it will have arrived at the destination before them ; resting, it outstrips all in a race." Isa., 4.

[Opposite predicates mutually superimpose and rescind each other and thus reveal the transcendental nature of the Self.]

2. " It is verily other than the known, and above the unknown. " Ke., 1-4.

[The known or the manifold world of names and forms is first denied and, lest it be presumed to be the unmanifest world, that is also expressly negated. In the result the seeker is led to the intuition of Atman untainted by the knowable or conceivable objective world.]

3. "That which has no sound, no touch, and no colour, that which is undecaying, tasteless, eternal, and scentless ; that which has neither beginning nor end, that which is beyond the mahat, that which is constant- realizing that, one is released from the jaws of death. " Ka., 1-3-15.

[Here the cancellation of the superimpositions proceeds gradually from the grosser to the subtler till one finally realizes Reality in all its nakedness and is thereby freed from death, that is, from ignorance, desire and action as Shankara explains it.]

4. " He who is of divine splendour, formless, the Purusha (all-pervading), unborn without or within, without Prāṇa, without mind, pure, beyond even the imperishable (undifferentiated seed of the world)- from this one, is born Prāṇa, the mind, all the senses, the air, the fire, the water and the earth that supporteth all. " Mun., 2-1-2.

[From Brahman, which knows no birth and which is without Prana, without mind, without senses, and without the elements, are born Prana and other effects, that is to say, everything is superimposed on it. Hence it is that the Sruti can declare that all this is Brahman. See Mun., 2-1-11.]

5. "Not inwardly conscious, not outwardly conscious, not conscious bothways, not solidified consciousness, neither conscious nor unconscious, unperceived, not an object of human dealings, ungraspable, uninferable with the aid of a sign, inconceivable, inexpressible, intuited only through the notion of the one Self, free from all distinctions, tranquil, the highest good, non-dual—that, they call the Fourth, that is the Self, that is what is to be known. " Man., 7.

[Here not only the three states of consciousness and their contents, but also all possible conceptual determinations are denied implying thereby that what is called the knowledge of Brahman is only intuition and not any intellectual judgment of the empirical nature.]

6. "That is the Infinite (Brahman) in which one sees nothing else, hears nothing else, knows nothing else. And that in which one sees something else, hears something else, knows something else-that is the finite. That which is Infinite is verily immortal, and that which is finite, is mortal. 'On what does the Infinite rest, revered sir ? ' 'On its own glory, or rather, not even on its glory. " Ch., 7-24-1.

[The very idea of a second is denied here implying that the Infinite, should not be likened to the mathematical one opposed to the finite. It is the Absolute, knowing no distinctions within it or allowing no second outside it. It is neither different from nor opposed to anything else, for there is nothing else beside it.]

7. " This is verily that Akshara (the imperishable Reality), O Gārgi, which the knowers of Brahman say, is neither gross nor subtle, neither short nor long, not red, not oily, not a shadow, not darkness, not the air, not the ether, not adhesive, without taste, without smell, without eyes, without ears, without the vocal organ, without mind, without light, without the vital power, without mouth, without measure, without interior or exterior. It never consumes anything ; nor is it consumed by anyone. " Br., 3-8-8.

[Here the negation of opposites is for suggesting that whenever some attribute is denied, its opposite should not be taken to be implied, Further negations are meant for warning against the assumption that it is a substance or quality, or it is something unsubstantial like a shadow or darkness; that it should never be taken to be akin to one of the five bhutas or elements that constitute the universe, or to have the nature of some internal organ. In fact, as Shankara says, nothing is to be attributed to or predicated of it, since it is the One without a second.]

We need not multiply instances any more to convince the reader of the true import of negations in the Upanishads as applied to the Absolute. All that is intended is that no positive desription of Reality is possible and no proof is needed to establish the existence of Ātman. No description of the Absolute is possible for the simple reason that it is beyond the range of both words and concepts which can only objectify empirical things. And there is no need whatever of any evidence to prove its existence inasmuch as it is self-established as being the self of everyone and everything. The negations are merely to annul the false ascriptions of avidyā obscuring its true nature. I shall close this section by citing a few instances from the Gita and the Brahma-sūtras to show how both of them endorse this view.

The Bhagavadgīta

(1) "He is never born, nor does he ever die. This one is not going to cease to be, after having been once. Unborn, eternal, everlasting, primeval, He is not slain when the body is slain." G., 2-20.

(2) "This one, weapons cannot cut; this one, fire cannot burn; this one, water cannot moisten; this one, the wind cannot dry." G., 2-23.

(3) "He is unperceivable, He is inconceivable, and He is unchangeable, they say." G., 2-25.

(4) Beginningless is that Supreme Brahman. It is said to be neither being nor non-being." G., 13-12.

(5) While appearing to discharge the functions of all the senses, it is devoid of all the senses; having no contact, it supports all; devoid of the guṇas, it experiences the guṇas." G., 13-14.

(6) "It is both within and without all beings. It is both the moving and the unmoving. It is both far and near." G., 13-15.

(7) "It is undivided, yet appears as though it were divided in beings. Supporter of beings too is that knowable, both absorbing and generating." G., 13-16.

[These negations and predications of the opposites are all to be explained in the light of our observations on the Shruti texts.]

Brahma-Sūtra

(1) "Then, therefore, the enquiry into Brahman." VS., 1-1-1.

(2) (Pradhāna cannot be supposed to be denoted by the word sat) because of svāpyaya or merging of (the individual self in its own Self). Vs., 1-1-9.

[Here enquiry of Brahman is recommended in 1-1-1 thereby implying that the enquirer is different from Brahman since the latter is to be enquired into. But in 1-1-9 the 'Sat' (Being) spoken of in Ch., 6-8-1 is concluded to be Brahman itself since the individual soul is taught there as being merged in its own Self, thus cancelling the difference implied in 1-1-1.]

(3) "(Indra) advises (Pratardana to meditate on him alone) from the standpoint of śastra, like Vāmadeva. VS., 1-1-30.

[Here the perfect identity of the individual self and Brahman is declared to be the Vedic view, or the right view, thereby implying that the difference between the two is only from the empirical view, the outcome of avidya.]

(4) "Not even on account of states (upādhis) can the Highest Brahman be regarded as possessing a two-fold character." VS., 3-2-11.

(5) "It is formless emphatically for (the texts teaching that) are of that direct import. VS., 3-2-14.

[While Brahman is admitted to be with form and specific properties in sutras like 1-1-20 and 1-2-1, it is emphasized here that Brahman is devoid of all characterstic features and forms, for the texts teaching forms and features do not aver that Brahman is really invested with these properties, while texts that deny specific features have that denial as their main purport.[1]]

1. This point will be discussed in greater detail in the next section, under the title 'The Two Aspects of Brahman'.

SECTION FOUR

THE TWO STANDPOINTS

1. The Uses of the Empirical View

From the foregoing exposition of the method of Vedānta, it will be clear that the teaching of śrutis pre-supposes two different points of view in its procedure. One of these is the natural view, the empirical view which persuades a man to look upon himself as an ego endowed with mind and senses, and stationed in a manifold universe along with other embodied beings like himself, knowing, acting, reaping and experiencing the fruits of his actions good or bad. This view the śruti calls the view of avidya in contrast to the correct view, the view of vidya, from the standpoint[1] of Ātman as he is, The Upanishads, however, do make use of the empirical view to a very large extent in connection with their peculiar method, the adhyāropāpavāda employed as a device to reveal the absolutely Real.

It must not be supposed that the śrutis condemn the emperical view altogether as wholly illusory and useless. For they utilise it to prescribe not only the modes of conduct and discipline necessary to qualify the seeker for acquiring the correct knowledge of Brahman, but also certain meditations (upāsanas) and adaptations of Vedic rituals which would indirectly help the aspirant to prepare himself to attain self-knowledge later on. There are minor upāsanās too prescribed from this point of view, which would be instrumental in securing, for the qualified followers, fruits similar to those vouched for rituals in the Karmakā da portion.

1. For shruti texts making this distinction the reader is refered to the previous section dealing with the Basic Super-imposition (p.47).

2. The Two Aspects of Brahman

These two views account for the double character of Brahman as presented in the Upanishads. Certain passages present Brahman as totally devoid of all specific features, while others describe it as possessing a number of distinctive attributes. How is this apparent contradiction to be resolved? Bādarāyaṇa in his Vedanta Sūtras and Śaṅkara in his commentary on the same, have laid down a principle to be observed in interpreting such texts : " It has been established in Vs. 1-1-4 that passages like Br. 3-8-8, K. 1-3-15, Ch. 8 14-1, Mu. 2-1-2, Br. 2-5-19 etc., have for their purport the Reality which is differenceless Brahmātman and do not principally aim at teaching anything else. So in passages of this nature, Brahman should be definitely understood to be devoid of all forms. As for the other passages which treat of Brahman with form, they are not primarily meant to teach it, for their main purport is to lay down injunctions for meditation. As long as they are not opposed to the former texts, they have to be taken to mean what they say ; where, however, there is contardiction, the texts whose purport is to teach the nature of Brahman would be of greater force than those whose ultimate purport is not the dctermination of the nature of Brahman. This is the reason why Brahman is to be regarded as altogether without form and not otherwise, even while texts of both the classes are to be found in the Upanishads."

SB, 3-2-14.

Thus, from the higest standpoint, Brahman has no attributes whatever of its own, has no second to it and is, in fact, the sole Reality. But yet, from the empirical standpoint, the same Brahman is also to be meditated upon as endowed with attributes. As, for instance, in the passage "All this is verily Brahman, since it originates from it, dissolves into it and moves in it. So let a man meditate upon it in peace. 'Made up of mind, having Prāṇa for his body, of the nature of effulgence, having a will never thwarted, all-pervasive like ether, creator of all, possessing all pure desires, all sweet odours, all delicious tastes, all-pervading, without any sense-organs as that of speech and without flurry. This is my Self within the heart, this is Brahman, and this, I am going to attain after departing from here.' Whoever has such firm conviction and entertains no doubt, attains this goal. So says S'āṇdilya, yea, S'āṇdilya." Ch., 3-14-1, 2, 4.

Brahman may even possess a form, such as the one described in Ch., 1-6-6. "Now the golden person who is seen in the sun, the Purusha with a golden beard and golden hair, everything golden to the very tips of his nails."

It is not to be supposed that such attributes and forms are illusory and no more, since they are to be regarded as unreal from the Paramārtha standpoint. For, being enjoined in the s'ruti for meditation, they are as real as anything that we see and touch, as any real ideas that we entertain in the empirical world. S'aṅkara observes: "When one is told to bring the king's man or the owner of the variegated cow, one makes no effort to bring the attrbute - the king or the cow also. Lest it be thought that the same principle applies here, the attributes such as 'creator of all' are repeated here for meditation." Similarly, with regard to the form of Brahman, that commentator remarks, "Even the Supreme Lord may, at his pleasure, assume a bodily shape formed of māyā in order to favour his devotees. Accordingly, the smṛti says 'O Nārada, that thou seest me in this form is the māya projected by me ; you should not think that I am really endowed with the properties of the five elements.' Moreover, where the essential nature of the Supreme Lord devoid of all specific features is taught, only then would apply the Śāstra such as 'without sound, without touch, without form, undecaying.' As the cause of all, however, the Highest Lord is described as possessing some of the properties of the effects also for purposes of meditation by texts like the following one : 'The creator of all, possessing all desires, all odours, all tastes.' The text representing Him as having a golden beard etc. may be treated likewise. As to the objection that he cannot be the Highest Lord since the śruti speaks of an abode, we reply, even the Lord who rests in His own glory, may be taught as having an abode just for meditation, since being all-pervasive, Brahman may be taken to be within everything like ether. And the śruti teaching a limitation to his authority is also for the sake of meditation, the limitations taught being relative to the adhyātma (the sphere of the human body) and the adhidaiva (the sphere of the gods, respectively.)" SB., 1-1-20.

This long extract is very instructive with reference to some important points in Śāṅkara Vedānta. (1) Brahman as it is in itself as well as its special aspect taught for meditation has been designated by the same word 'Īśvara'. (2) The attributes or forms of Brahman recommended for meditation, are notwithstanding that they are the products of māyā, no more illusory than any concrete things that one deals with in the empirical world, inasmuch as they are assumed by the Lord for favouring the devotees. (3) The meditation of Brahman as qualified by these limiting conditions, does lead ultimately to the highest result or moksha where the devotee attains the same Brahman which is his very self. 'Esha ma ātmā etad Brahma etam itah pretya abhisambavitāsmi एष म आत्मा एतद् ब्रह्म एतम् इतः प्रेत्याभिसंभाविताऽस्मि', (4) There is a relatively higher value attached to the qualities, forms, abodes etc., ascribed to Brahman than to those of embodied beings including the gods, since the Lord is taught to be emphatically distinct and different from these jīvas 'Bhedavyapadeśaccānyah'(भेदव्यपदेशाच्चान्यः VS., 1-1-22).

Two different epithets 'Para' Brahman and 'Apara' Brahman have been used in the śrutis to enable the student to distinguish these two aspects of Brahman :

(१) एतद्वै सत्यकाम परं चापरं च ब्रह्म यदोङ्कारः । प्र. ५-१

(२) एतद्ध्येवाक्षरं ब्रह्म एतद्ध्येवाक्षरं परम् । का. १-२-१६.

This distinction of the two aspects is also recognized in the Vedānta sūtras :

"कार्यं बादरिरस्य गत्युपपत्तेः" (वे. सू. ४-३-७)

The 'Aparā' or Lower Brahman is also called the Kārya Brahman. The variants for 'apara' and 'para'(Brahman) are to be found in the following Bhāshya : "with regard to the passage 'He leads them to Brahma' the doubt arises whether he leads them to the kārya (effect), apara (lower) Brahman or to the para (higher), avikṛta (not effected), mukhya (principal) Brahman. Whence this doubt ? Because the common name Brahman is used without any qualifying epithet, and because this particular s'ruti speaks of 'going'. Here the teacher Badari is of opinion that the person who is not a man, leads them only to the kārya (effect), saguṇa (qualified) apara (lower) Brahman." SB., 4-4-7, p. 495. Hence it is evident that S'aṅkara uses the words para (higher). mukhya (principal), nirguṇa (having no qualities), and karaṇa (cause) for Brahman as it is, while apara (lower) gauṇa (secondary), saguṇa (having qualities), and karya (effected) for Brahman recommended for meditation. This is clarified further on where S'aṅkara observes "Owing to its proximity to the Higher Brahman, it is not inconsistent to use the word Brahman, with reference to the lower Brahman also. For it is the same Higher Brahman which is designated as the Lower (Brahman) when it is sometimes recommended to be meditated upon as endowed with certain qualities, such as being 'made up of the mind' (Ch., 3-4-12)".

SB., 4-3-9, p. 495.

Or again :—

"But would not such (distinction of a higher and a lower Brahman) militate against the S'ruti text teaching non-duality? No. For we have removed this objection by the remark that (the distinction) is only due to the limiting conditions of name and form created by avidyā." SB., 4-3-14, p. 502.

Readers will have been convinced by now that the epithets para, mukhya, nirguṇa etc. (in contrast to apara, gauṇa, suguṇa etc.) are merely convenient terms used to point to Brahman as it is, and are meant neither for sharply distinguishing it from the lower Brahman, nor for disparaging the rank of the latter. These contrasting epithets should never be supposed to interfere with the identical nature of Brahman in whichever context the S'ruti may present it. This explains why S'aṅkara uses the appelations Parameswara and Paramātman indifferently for both the aspects of Brahman. This is why too, that S'aṅkara does not hesitate to make use of the term Para Brahman even while he is discussing Brahman as the object of meditation,[1] for there he has only to contrast Brahman with Jiva or some other entity, and not with Brahman to be known as such. Failure to notice this subtle distinction, has been responsible for many uncalled-for criticisms of S'aṅkara by G. Thibaut and Col. Jacob[2] consideration of which has to be postponed as not germane to the present discussion. Students who wish to steer clear of similar pitfalls will do well to rivet their attention upon the following important passage in S'aṅkara's Sūtra Bhāshya.

एकमपि ब्रह्म अपेक्षितोपाधिसंबन्धं निरस्तोपाधिसंबन्धं च उपास्यत्वेन ज्ञेयत्वेन च वेदान्तेषूपदिश्यत इति प्रदर्शयितुं परो ग्रन्थ आरभ्यते ॥

" One and the same Brahman is taught in the Vedānta as an object of meditation, when it desiderates certain limiting conditions or as an object of knowledge when it is regarded to be free from all limiting conditions. The sequel is begun to show how this is."[3]

SB., 1-1-12.

1. As for instance in VS., 1-2-1, 1-2-2, 1-3-15 etc.

2. Thibaut (VS., xcii, xxxviii, xci, xciv); Jacob (VSa., viii, ix).

These and other criticisms will have to be duly considered in the second volume of the present work in connection with Ramanuja's system.

3. Sankara does not mean to say, as alleged by Thibaut (VS., xxxii, xxxiii) that all the passages discussed hereafter, will be devoted to settle the question whether the Saguna Brahman or the Nirguna Brahman is meant in each case, but only whether certain passages refer to Brahman or something else. Whether in any individual text Brahman is to be taken as an object of meditation or not, depends entirely on an express injunction or its absence, and not upon what appelation the Sruti or Shankara uses to designate Brahman.

2. Vidyā and Avidyā

The apparently indiscriminate use in the Upanishads of the terms vidya and avidya in various senses, has to be justified by the context in which they occur.

A few passages may be cited to illustrate this :—

1. 'These two, what is known as avidyā and what as vidyā, are wide apart proceeding in different directions.' Ka., 1-2-4.

[We are here dealing with the 'knowledge of Brahman' in contrast to works and meditation leading to prosperity in this or the other world.]

2. 'Vidya and Avidya are different. That which one performs with vidyā, faith and concentration, that alone world be more effective.' Ch., 1-1-10.

[Here we have to do with the 'meditation' on the Udgeetha.]

3. 'He attains immortality through vidyā, after crossing death through Avidyā.' Isa., 11.

[This is in the context of ends and means. Hence Avidya here refers to Vedic ritual and Vidya to meditation.]

4. 'In the same way, this Ātman having cast down the body and sent it into Avidya, takes hold of another support and withdraws himself.' Br., 4-4-3.

[This is in the context of Jiva's transmigration. Hence avidya here means unconsciousness.]

Now S'aṅkara has reserved the term Parā vidyā for the Higher knowledge, which results in immediate release as contrasted with aparā vidyā (lower knowledge) which leads to gradual liberation after death. The terms being only relative, no stigma need be supposed to be attached to the aparā vidyā just on the score that it has been called 'lower'. The remarks that have been made with reference to the terms Para-Brahman and Apara-Brahman apply here pari passu.

Whenever Brahman is presented as something to be known, it is to be considered to be absolutely free from the taint of the Upādhis or limiting conditions through which it is taught. These conditions are of course empirically real as is the distinction of the known, knowledge, and the knowable. All this is, however, nullified by true knowledge, or spiritual intuition, of Brahman which knows no second. This is therefore parā vidyā, the highest knowledge vouchsafed to the soul in the Upanishads. The aparā vidyā is not knowledge in this sense, for it is only upāsanā or dhyāna (meditation). Lest the two be confounded, Śaṅkara has defined them as follows :

"Dhyāna or meditation, though mental, can yet be done, or not done, or even done in a different way altogether by a person, for it is dependent on the (will of the) person (performing it). Knowledge, on the other hand, has to be produced by a pramāṇa or means of right knowledge. A means of knowledge, again, relates to something really existing and as such cannot be done, not done, or done in a different way; for it depends solely upon the objective thing which really exists but not upon a Vedic injunction or on the will of a person. Hence, though mental, knowledge is widely different from meditation." SB., 1-1-4, p. 18.

Bearing this distinction in mind, the critical reader can now decide, whether or not there are two vidyās — the aparā vidyā or meditation enjoined and the parā vidyā or knowledge properly so-called — pertaining to Brahman formally recognized by the Upanishads. This is what Thibaut remarks in this connection : " 'Brahman' is indeed sometimes described as saguṇa and sometimes as nirguṇa (to use later terms), but it is nowhere said that thereon rests a distinction of two different kinds of knowledge leading to altogether different results. " (VS., p. cxvi).

I fear, he misses the point altogether. The name para or apara may or may not be there expressly inserted in each passage. But do we find or do we not find, two distinct sets of texts – one set enjoining meditation, and the other simply revealing the nature of Brahman ? And is there or is there not, a difference of fruits taught in respect of the two vidyās, the result of Parā vidyā or knowledge of Brahman without any attributes being – not 'immediate absorption in Brahman on death' as Thibaut (VS., p. lxxxviii) believes, but – what S'aṅkara calls sadyomukti, immediate release through knowledge 'atra Brahma samas'nute – अत्र ब्रह्म समश्नुते', 'taddhāsya vijajñau तद्धास्य विजज्ञौ' (vide K. 2-3-14, Ch., 6-11-3), while the result of the aparā vidyā or krama-mukti gradual release, that is to say, reaching Brahman through the way of the gods, thence no more to return. 'esha deva pathō Brahma patha etena pratipadyamānā imam mānavam āvartham nāvartānte एष देवपथो ब्रह्म पथ एतेन प्रतिमद्यमाना इमं मानवमावर्तं नावर्तन्ते' (Ch., 4-15-5) ? If there is such a distinction, then even granting for the nonce that the words 'parā vidyā' and 'aparā vidyā' do not occur in the Upainishads, S'aṅkara's system enunciating the doctrine of two truths will have to be admitted to be the only the system recognized in those scriptures.

As a matter of fact, however, one Upanishad at least, does expressly refer to the two vidyās, as Thibaut himself admits. Thibaut thinks that " in several places we find the knowledge of the sacrificial part of the Veda with its supplementary disciplines contrasted as inferior with the knowledge of the Self, to which latter distinction the Muṇḍaka Upanishad (1-4), applies the terms aparā and parā vidyā " (VS., p. cxvi). Now, is this interpretation true to fact ? I think not. For in the first place, there is no mention of 'the sacrificial part of the Veda' in the mantras 4 and 5. The Upanishad simply states that the aparā vidyā consists of the Ṛgveda, the Yajurveda, the Sāmaveda, the Atharvaveda, śiksha, kalpa, vyākaraṇa, nirukta, chandus, and jyotisha ' (Mu. 5). No school of Vedānta in India excludes the Upanishads from the Vedic literature, and hence it could never be exact to say that only the sacrificial portion of the Veda comes under the aparā vidyā referred to here. Śaṅkara, has the support of the Upanishad itself when he insists that the aparā vidyā, the knowledge of the Vedic injunctions (vidhi vishaya) on the one hand, is contrasted here with the Parā vidyā or the knowledge of the A*kshara* or the eternal Para-Brahman on the other. For this Upanishad classes the meditation of the Lower Brahman also along with the knowledge of the sacrificial rites (Mu., 1-2-11) before undertaking a detailed consideration of the Parā vidyā (from Mu., 1-2-12 onwards). That this verse really contains a reference to the aparā vidyā is borne out by the indication of the fruit of meditation. "They go through the sun, freed from all defilement, where that immortal and undecaying Purusha resides." (Mu. 1-2-11) And in this very same Upanishad we are definitey told the fruit of Parā vidyā thus : "He who knows the Highest Brahman becomes that very Brahman. " (Mu., 3-2-9).

4. The Transcendental Nature of the Knowledge of Brahman

That the Upanishads do not undertake to prove the existence of Brahman by an appeal to pramāṇas such as sensuous perception, is evident from passages like the following : "All this is Brahman alone" (Mu., 2-2-1), "All this is Atman alone"(Ch., 7-25-2), "Where there is duality, as it were, there one sees another, one smells another ;.... but where, to this knowing one, all has become Ātman, then how can one see anything else, and with what organ ? " (Bṛ., 4-5-15). This is what prompts Śaṅkara, to make this apparently sweeping statement :

तमेतम् अविद्याख्यम् आत्मानात्मनोरितरेतराध्यासं पुरस्कृत्य सर्वे प्रमाण-प्रमेयव्यवहारा लौकिका वैदिकाश्च प्रवृत्ताः, सर्वाणि च शास्त्राणि विधिप्रतिषेध-मोक्षपराणि ॥

"All the talk of pramāṇas and their objects whether relating to the ordinary life or to Vedic action and all scriptures relating to injunctions and prohibitions of actions, or to mōksha, pre-suppose this mutual adhyāsa or super-imposition of the self and the non-self, called Avidyā, before they function." (SB., p. 21). And he makes this good by drawing our attention to the fact that no one could consider himself competent to perceive or think before presuming that he is identical with the body in which the senses and the mind function (dehendriyādishu aham-mamābhimānarahitasya pramatṛtvānupapattau pramāṇapravṛttyanupapatteh देहेन्द्रियादिष्वहंममाभिमानरहितस्य प्रमातृत्वानुपपत्तौ प्रमाणप्रवृत्त्यनुपपत्तेः ॥ SB., p. 2.)[1]

1. A student of the Upanishads is struck by the conspicuous absence of the word 'pramana' in all the Upanishads, This circumtance alone should be sufficient for a discerning scholar to arrive at the conclusion that Vedanta as taught by the Upanishads is not based on the ordinary canons of knowledge,

That Vedānta is not a speculative system is borne out by the Upanishad texts which warn us that "this knowledge of Brahman is un-attainable by ratiocination" (naishā tarkeṇa matirāpaneyā नैषा तर्केण मतिरापनेया K., 1-2 9). Śaṅkara gives an alternative interpretation of this text, which assures us that the intuition of Brahman transcends the entire sphere of logic. " Or this text may also mean that this intuition cannot be dispelled by logical reasoning." Reasoning based upon intuition, however, is by no means precluded in arriving at the ultimate knowledge ; for "The knowledge of Brahman is taken to culminate in a result to be experienced in this very life, for only as culminating in an intuition dispersing all avidyā it serves as a means to final release. (SB., 2-2-4, p. 84). And Śruti itself lays down that Ātman is to be thought over (mantavyah) besides being heard (studied through the Śastras). Only, dry speculation not based upon experience has no place here (nānena misheṇa śushka-tarkasya atra ātmalābhah sambhavati नानेन मिषेण शुष्कतर्कस्य अत्र आत्मलाभः संभवति SB., 2-1-6, p. 180).

That Vedāntic knowledge of Reality transcends all the concepts and limitations implied in the empirical view—efforts, means and fruits of actions ; cause and effect, and time itself—is rendered clear from the following Upanishadic text in the form of a question posed by Naciketas :

"That which thou seest as being beyond good and bad deeds, beyond that which is effected and which is not the effect, beyond past and future, please tell me that." K., 1-2-14.

And lastly, that the Highest Reality and goal taught by the Upanishads transcends all concepts and verbal symbols, is revealed by the following text :

यतो वाचो निवर्तन्ते । अप्राप्य मनसा सह । आनन्दं ब्रह्मणो विद्वान् । न बिभेति कुतश्चनेति ॥

"That from which all words fall back along with the mind unable to reach it, one knowing that bliss of Brahman, is not afraid of anything whatever." Tai., 2-9.

How then are we to know this Brahman ? The senses are the only doors open to mankind for perceiving phenomena, concepts are the means to grasp things as they are and there is no means other than language to communicate our ideas to others. If the only means available are pronounced incompetent to know or to teach Brahman, will that not be tantamount to confessing that Vedānta has no truth to propound to its votaries ? This objection betrays ignorance of the fundamental doctrine as well as the unique method of Vedānta.

The Upanishadic teaching is तदेतद्ब्रह्मापूर्वमनपरमनन्तरमबाह्यमयमात्मा ब्रह्म सर्वानुभूः ॥

"Now this Brahman has neither a before nor an after, neither a within nor a without ; this self, the knower of everything is Brahman. This is the teaching." Br., 2-5-19, p. 780.

The senses and concepts are no doubt the means of knowing the objective phenomena of this world, but the knower in general being the pre-supposition of all the processes of knowing, must be granted to be self-evident and can never be thought of in any way as desiderating some 'means' of knowing him. Now the fundamental doctrine of Vedānta is that this Self as the universal knower who intuits everything sarvānubhūh सर्वानुभूः, is essentially Brahman, and, as such, altogether transcends the sphere of empirical knowledge, the sphere which comprehends the distinctions of the knower, means of knowledge and the object of knowledge. It is a radical error therefore which assails each one of us when we assume that we are individual knowers endowed with intellect and other means of knowledge which enable us to know objects. It is to dispel this inherent error, that the Upanishads employ the unique method known as the adhyāropa-apavāda, where word-symbols used need not directly denote the self or Brahman but only serve to suggest what is not really characteristic of it, while the human mind naturally takes it to be such. Brahman as the witnessing principle in us all, being of the very nature of consciousness, needs no extraneous means to know it. It has to be intuited by the self in itself as something devoid of all determining features, as the all in reality. (ātmanyevātmānam pas'yati sarvamātmānam pas'yati आत्मन्येवात्मानं पश्यति सर्वमात्मानं पश्यति)

Br., 4-4-23.

5. The Highest Goal of Life

Even the statement that one has got to dispel a beginningless error which obstructs one's intuiting oneself as Brahman, is of course only a truth from the lower standpoint. The only way, therefore, to gain our freedom which is already attained, is to raise ourselves to a position from where we see that we have been ever-free. There are texts in plenty interspersed among the Upanishads which make this abundantly clear. One such from the Brhadāraṇyaka will quite suffice here. In summing up the entire teaching of the Upanishad, this text most un-equivocally declares :

स वा एष महानज आत्माऽजरोऽमरोऽमृतोऽभयो ब्रह्म । अभयं वै ब्रह्माभयं हि वै ब्रह्म भवति य एवं वेद ॥

" Now this (soul) indeed, is the all-pervading birthless Self, ageless, undying, immortal, fearless Brahman. Brahman of course is fearless, and he becomes indeed the fearless Brahman, whoever knows this " (Br., 4-4-24). To this end, we have only to abandon the self-imposed obstacle of habitual wrong thinking which makes us extrovert. The part to be played by the s'rutis or a teacher in this process has been thus stated by S'aṅkara :

"Whoever is extrovertly inclined and seeks to attain what he would welcome, and to avoid what he would dislike, but cannot reach the absolute fulfilment of his desires, such a person longing for the attainment of the highest goal, s'rutis like 'Ātman alone is to be seen' divert from the object of the natural activity of the aggregate of the body and the senses, and turn the stream of his thoughts towards the inmost Self. Then for him who has set about in search of this Self, the real nature of the Ātman as neither to be courted nor to be shunned is taught by s'rutis such as " All this is the Ātman " (Br., 2-4-6), "Where to this knowing one, everything has become Ātman alone, then how can one see another and with what (means) ? How can one know another and with what ? With what can one possibly know the knower (himself) ? " (Br. 4-5-15). " This Ātman is Brahman" (Br. 2-5-19). SB, 1-1-4, p. 19.

Now the path thus recommended by the S'rutis is known as the nivṛtti - mārga, the way of beating back and coming to our own real Self. The steps in the process of this return are thus pointed out:

1. "Therefore, one who knows it thus, and has a calm mind, control of the senses, and forbearance and has secured an unruffled state of mind, can see the Self in his own self, and everything as Ātman."

Br., 4-4-23.

2. The discerning seeker should merge speech (and other senses) in the mind, sink that mind in the knowing self (or intellect), and this intellect he should merge in the great Ātman (the knower), and the (knower) in the Ātman free from all mundane disturbances." K., 1-3-1.

And the fruit of this practice is this: "Contemplating on that Self, one no longer bewails; having been already free, he becomes free." K., 2-2-1.

SECTION FIVE

THE TRADITION BEFORE S'AṄKARA

1. GAUḌAPĀDA

S'aṅkara is the earliest teacher whose extant Bhāshyas give us a picture of the unique method of Vedānta in all its working detail. But he is by no means the first discoverer of the method. In fact he remembers with great reverence the ancient teachers[1] who wrote commentaries on all the Upanishads even before him. Of such teachers, it is some satisfaction to know that there is at least one whose work is extant till today ; and that is Gauḍapāda who has summarized the teachings of the Upanishads in his kārikās or expository verses on the Māṇḍūkya. For a fuller information regarding this work, the reader is referred to my Sanscrit commentary, the Māṇḍūkya Rahasya-vivṛti. Here I shall merely indicate in outlines how Goudapāda was perfectly aware of this traditional method.

In the Āgama Prakaraṇa, or the first chapter of his work, so named because it expounds the traditional method adopted in the S'ruti, he shows how the three different aspects of Ātman—outwardly conscious, inwardly conscious or pure consciousness—are merely super-impositions on the Turiya or the Real Self which is forever untainted with svapna-nidrā (dream sleep or wrong knowledge) or asvapna-nidrā (dreamless sleep or absence of knowledge I-II to 15) and closes his teaching with the observation " that

1. The second opening verse, Tai. Bh.

"when the soul wakes up from its beginningless illusory slumber, then it becomes aware of the truth that it is really the Secondless One unborn, forever unsullied by the sleep of ignorance or by the dream of wrong knowledge" (1-16). Incidentally in the examination of the Self conditioned by sleep, he discusses the question of creation and declares himself in favour of the theory that all creation is like unto dreams or magic (1-7).

In the second chapter, entitled the Vaitathya Prakaraṇa, Gauḍapāda exhibits the first step of rescission of the avasthās. Availing himself of the identical epithets saptāṅga (seven-limbed) ekonaviṁśati mukha (having ninteen doors of knowledge) applied by the Śruti to the Self conditioned by waking or dream, he adduces śrutyanukūla-tarka (reasoning in consonance with the spirit of the śruti) to establish the identical nature of waking and dream in all respects (2-5 to 10), thus deducing the corollary that the Self is bound by neither of the two illusory states (2-12). He then proceeds to show how this line of reasoning compels us to conclude that the self is really non-dual and on it are super-imposed both the subjective and the objective phenomena encountered in either state. They are in fact the Ātman himself mis-conceived, very much like an imaginary serpent or a line of water super-imposed on a rope seen in the dark (2-17, 18). This leads him to the further conclusion that all distinctions-like those of creation and dissolution of the world, or of a soul bound by saṁsāra, means employed for liberation, or even the distinction of one seeking liberation and another liberated - are quite unreal from the paramārtha or the highest stand-point (2-32). In fact, says Gauḍapāda, all that is, whether within or without, is the tattva or Reality alone. One who realizes this is himself the Reality and for ever revels in it. He can never slip down from Reality (2-38).

The Advaita Prakaraṇa or the third chapter deals with the concept of the creation of individual souls and their limiting conditions. Evidently Gauḍapāda here intends to teach that the epithet 'prabhavāpyayau hi bhūtānām प्रभवाप्ययौ हि भूतानाम्' (the origin and dissolution of beings) as applied to Prājña in the śruti, should not be literally construed as implying an actual creation of souls who are actually to attain Brahman after practising meditation. While he does not deny the efficacy of Upāsanās from the empirical standpoint for mediocre aspirants (3-16), he is anxious to hold up the ideal of the unborn Brahman, and therefore frankly dubs the upāsaka as narrow-minded (kṛpaṇa) since one who practises upāsanā stays in the region of the 'born-Brahman (jāte brahmaṇi vartate जाते ब्रह्मणि वर्तते 3-1). The one important topic for discussion here, therefore, is creation. Some of his contemporaries evidently supposed that Brahman has really transformed itself into the world of Jivas and other things and that there will be a real re-transformation of the world into Brahman again. This cannot be, since that would mean that the immortal Brahman becomes the mortal jīva and that the mortal jīva again becomes the immortal Brahman, an impossible tenet, since nothing can really change its nature on any account (3-21). The only conclusion, therefore, to be drawn from the accounts of creation taught in the śrutis, is that all origination is illusory from the highest point of view (3-24) and that the śrutis which teach by illustration of 'clay', 'iron', 'sparks' and the like, are only using a device to introduce the inquirer to the intuition of the one Ātman (3-15). The Upanishad, moreover, which again and again (Br., 3-9-26, 4-2-4, 4-4-22 and 4-5-15) repeats 'sa esha neti netyātmā स एष नेति नेत्यात्मा' (this is the Ātman who has been described as 'not this, not that') thereby rescinding whatever explanation it has offered, evidently aims at revealing the transcendent unborn Brahman (3-26).

It will thus be seen that Gauḍapāda explains all negations in the śruti as an apahnava or rescission of vikalpas (ascriptions) from the transcendental point of view. He also refers incidentally to the Pancakośa prakriyā (3-11) and the Madhu-Brahmaṇa (3-12) to illustrate this traditional method.

Gauḍapāda teaches that the direct intuition of the Highest Reality (atmasatyānubodha आत्मसत्यानुबोध 3-32) or the yōga of non-contact (asparśayoga अस्पर्शयोग 3-39) is meant only for the highest class of aspirants, while he recommends (3-40) what he calls mano-nigraha (the same as nidhidhyāsana and the dhyānayoga of the Bhagavadgītā) to less-developed souls.

Gauḍapāda concludes that the highest reality is that which changes never a bit. This is the gist of the chapter. The other details given here being merely means to realize this, are only empiricaly real (3-48).

The fourth chapter, called the Alāta śanti begins with pointing out how the conflict of views held by the Vaiśeshikas and the Sāṅkhyas (4-3, 4) as also by the Sarvāstitva-vādins among the Buddhists on the one hand and the Vijñānavādins on the other (4-24 to 27) indirectly points to this same Unborn Reality (4-28 to 71).

It will be noted that the author lays special emphasis throughout on the fact that Reality is 'ajam anidram asvapnam अजमनिद्रं अस्वप्नम्' (1-16, 3-36, 4-81), unborn, sleep-free and dream-free; that is to say, free from all changes, ignorance and mis-conception. This uniform formula sums up all Upanishadic teaching concerning the Absolute according to Gauḍapāda, which he invariably brings home to the minds of his hearers by the one method of adhyārōpa-apavāda.

2. Other Ancient Vedāntins of the Tradition

It is sometimes urged that Gauḍapāda and S'aṅkara are the two first acāryas by whom a revolution in the Aupanishada thought was ushered in. Prof. T. R. V. Murthy, for instance, explains the nature of this revolution thus: "Advaitism is the conscious rejection of duality and difference as illusory. Brahman is established, not positively, but by the denial of dualiy." (CPB., 111). It would be perhaps more accurate to say that Brahman being the Self of everyone, need not be established at all; only the super-impositions on it have to be discarded by the negation of all duality by the method of adhyārōpa-apavāda. Looked at from this viewpoint, it is obvious that this method is the very pith and marrow of the procedure in the Upanishads as we have already seen. The revolution in thought, if any, has to be ascribed to the Upanishad-Ṛshis themselves rather than to Gaudapāda and S'aṅkara.

Col. Jacob, again, writes: "To me, therefore, it seems impossible to come to any other conclusion that the Vis'ishtādvaita-Vāda or some similar school, were in possession of the field in S'aṅkara's time, and that his own mind was so saturated with their doctrines as to be unable to shake them off even when propounding an antagonistic system (VSa., p. xx). This conjecture of Jacob's, that S'aṅkara was propounding a new system of his own as against the prevailing one is based on the supposed inconsistency in S'aṅkara's Bhāshya of mixing up the terms Param Brahma, Aparam Brahma and Iśwara in disregard of the distinction propounded by himself. I have already shown how this alleged inconsistency is purely fanciful. Apart from this fact, however, it could have been easily seen that S'aṅkara was no inventor of a system of his own, since he had at least one predecessor in Gauḍapāda whose work had fore-shadowed almost all the essentials of the system. A glance, moreover, at the Sūtra-Bhāshya, wherein S'aṅkara refers to Vṛttikaras[1] of his tradition, either approving or suggesting improvements on their exegesis, would have been sufficient to convince the critic that S'aṅkara was only rehearsing the principles of a tradition already well-established. As I have already explained (pp. 49, 60), references to the tradition, sampradāya, are seen interspersed in the Bhāshyas on the Gita as well as on the Upanishads no less than in the Sūtra-Bhāshya. Special mention may be made here of a reference to the so-called 'negative method' in the Aitareya Bhāshya (Introduction to the second chapter, p. 342), where the traditional story is recounted of a stupid man who could not understand the drift of the teaching that he was not a 'not-man' (nāsi twam amanushyah). In any case, the three ślokas quoted by S'aṅkara in his Bhāshya at the end of the fourth sūtra provide us with a clincher on this point :

1. Thus the Vrittikara referred to in the Anandamayadhikarana is admittedly of this tradition. (Vide SB., 1-1-11 p, 39) ; so is the one referred to in SB., 3-2-21 who posits Brahman to be devoid of all differentiating features (Pratyastamitasheshaprapancam प्रत्यस्तमिताशेष-प्रपञ्चम् SB., 3-2-21 p. 360)

गौणमिथ्यात्मनोऽसत्त्वे पुत्रदेहादिबाधनात् ।
सद्ब्रह्मात्माहमित्येवं बोधे कार्यं कथं भवेत् ॥ १ ॥

अन्वेष्टव्यात्मविज्ञानात् प्राक्प्रमातृत्वमात्मनः ।
अन्विष्टः स्यात् प्रमातैव पाप्मदोषादिवर्जितः ॥ २ ॥

देहात्मप्रत्ययो यद्वत् प्रमाणत्वेन कल्पितः ।
लौकिकं तद्वदेवेदं प्रमाणं त्वात्मनिश्चयात् ॥ ३ ॥

The first of these ślokas refers to the so-called degrees of reality since it states that when the figurative self such as one's own son, and the unreal self such as one's body are sublated, the intuition of Brahman accrues. It says, moreover, that after knowledge has dawned, there cannot linger any more a sense of some duty to be discharged. The second verse states that the distinctions of knower and known, prevails only so long as the intuition of the Ātman sought after, has not arisen. But as soon as it is sought out, the knower himself becomes the Brahman 'free from the blemish of evil (i. e. good and bad actions) and the like. This is as much as to say that the basic super-imposition of regarding oneself as the knower is annulled by the intuition of Brahman. The third and the last verse, avers that the idea of pramāṇas (means of proof) continues to be true so long as the real self is not realized. In other words, knowledge arising from understanding the meaning of the teaching of the śruti is the final pramāṇa that abolishes the reality of the distinctions of pramāṇa and prameya (means and object of knowledge). Now, this is almost all that Śaṅkara's system propounds and in the light of these verses, it can never be regarded as an innovation from the traditional Vedānta.

SECTION SIX

ANCIENT SYSTEMS DIVERGING FROM THE TRADITION OF S'AŃKARA

1. Systems about which only meagre information is available

Side by side with the system recognizing the Vedāntic method of adhyārōpa-apavāda, there were other systems interpreting the Upanishads in their own way. I have exhibited the most important of these in the fourth chapter of the present work so far as can be gathered from casual referenees in S'aṅkara's Bhāshya and Sures'vara's Vārtikas.

These systems can be classified into two main groups. The first group comprises systems that dismiss all hopes of building any theory of bondage and freedom on the independent basis of the Upanishads. They firmly believe that the karma-kāṇda can show the way to the highest goal of human life, the Upanishads being subservient to the ritualistic portion in some way or other. There were two sub-schools among these devotees of the karma-kāṇda. The first school believed that the 'svarga' offered as the fruit of Vedic rites performed is the only summum bonum while the other maintained that even the mōksha or ātmanyeva avasthānam आत्मन्येवावस्थानम् (resting in one's own true Self) as taught by the Vedāntins, can be secured through proper performance of the obligatory karmas enjoined in the Vedas. (pp. 118-122)'[1]

1. The pages referred to throughout this and the next section are of the present Sanscrit work.

The second group recognizes the usefulness of the Upanishads also, but is aligned to the karma-kāṇḍa in so far as it demands some form of Vedic injunction necessary to make any spiritual discipline efficient to bring about the desired end. The school demanding the conjunction of rituals and upāsanās (123-126) and the one insisting on the injunction of upāsana as the main purport of the Śruti while admitting that Brahman is also indirectly revealed as an accessory to meditation (126-128), had a decided leaning towards mīmāṁsa and they had therefore to be contented with an eschatalogical mukti. The school which declared that the exhaustion of all desires in the Prajāpati-loka, was the only way open to oneself for mukti (138), evidently placed Vedāntic knowledge beyond human reach. The Bhāgavata school teaches that the aspirant is absorbed in Brahman after death and becomes one with it as a result of continued devotion throughout life (144-147). Of the schools which acceded to the admission of freedom in the present life, we meet with several varieties: one that maintained that knowledge of Brahman is enjoined in the Śruti (129), another which asserted that the seeker is commanded by theŚruti to dissolve by meditation all the distinctions and differences in empirical life to enable him ro reach non-duality (133-137); a third which contended that the seeker is bidden to suppress the inherent impression of the three avasthās (waking, dream and deep-sleep), and a fourth whice supposed that the suppression of mental modifications is enjoined in the Śrutis (143-144). There were two schools which thought that mere knowledge accruing from a study of the Śrutis is not competent to bring an immediate release. One of them said that the continued remembrance of the knowledge was enjoined as the real means to Mukti (142-143). While the other known as the Prasaṅkhyāna school, supposed that the knowledge arising from the study of the scripture, should be repeatedly practised with the aid of reasoning, for getting at the actual intuition (130-133). This last school had a strange apprehension that ignorance of Ātman even after once dispersed by knowledge could revive and overpower even true knowledge!

It will be noticed that all these systems are advaitic in the sense that they hold the goal of life to be union with Brahman.

2. Bhartṛ-Prapañca

The last ancient school to be mentioned in this connection, is that of Bhartṛ-Prapañca. It is a pity that a closer study of his system has not been made either by orthodox paṇḍits or modern scholars, for he is the earliest representative of the Dvaita-advaita school that we are so far acquainted with. I have therefore devoted a separate chapter for the discussion of his teachings. He appears to be a contemporary of Śaṅkara, or at any rate, his system seems to have held the field in Vedānta at the time that Śaṅkara began to write his Bhāshya on the Bṛhadāraṇyaka, for it is his views more than those of any other, that are criticized almost at every step both by Śaṅkara and Sureśvara. A more detailed study, perhaps, would be helpful to scholars in tracing the vicissitudes of that school down to our own times. The teaching of this Bhāshyakāra comes very near to that of Śaṅkara in so much that he considers the relation of the individual soul and Brahman, to be closer than what any other similar school has allowed. I have set forth in some detail the most important of Bhartṛ-Prapañca's doctrines in order to assist the critical reader who would take up a comparative study. Brahman as the cause and the effect (149-152), the eight evolutionary stages of Brahman (152-153), the individual soul as a modification of Brahman (154-156), the self as the seer (156-160), qualification for Brahma-vidyā (160-163), examination of the three states of conciousness (163-172), Sākshātkāra (direct vision) of Brahman and the two varieties of liberation (172-173), the intermediate stage called 'apavarga' of the soul between bondage and absolute freedom (173-176), the conjunction of jñāna and karma as a means to mōksha (181-182) - on all these points Bhartṛ-Prapañca holds doctrines peculiar to his own system and conspicuous by their absence anywhere else.

3. Characteristics of Pre-Śāṅkara Vedānta

A study of the account of the Pre-Śāṅkara schools as detailed in the present work will, I hope, give a general picture of the Pre-Śāṅkara Vedānta. The reader will have noticed that the following are the common features that characterize these schools.

(1) All the schools are advaitic in the sense that they teach the ultimate identity of Jīva and Brahman.

(2) All the schools rely on the authority of the Vedas and disclose a bias towards some Vedic injunction.

(3) Rituals alone or combined with upāsana, or knowledge direct or a distilled form of it, or else a transformation of it into direct vision of Brahman, is invariably supposed to be enjoined by the s'rutis as the means to mōksha.

(4) Final release is mostly eschatalogical. Even schools which allow that Ātman is self-effulgent, have recourse to some injunction or other demanding the practice of some sādhana, to remove the obstacles to jñāna.

(5) Mōksha being presumed to be a goal to be reached through sheer effort, avidyā has little or no place in any of these schools of thought. Even schools that recognize avidyā have a very hazy notion of it.

It is clear that the schools did not take cognizance of the distinction between texts that aim at describing Brahman as it is and those that enjoin meditation of Brahman. They never suspected that the frequent negative description in which the Upanishads take delight, might possibly point to a method common to them all. Again, they did not attach sufficient importance to s'rutis which teach the eternal identity of Jīva and Brahman and promise immediate release simultaneous with the knowledge of Brahman. As a consequence of this neglect, they could not realize that avidyā is the only hindrance to the attainment of the goal. They were not aware of the distinction between the pārmārthika view and the vyāvahārika view-S'astradṛsti and lōkadṛsti – a distinction which could reconcile the transcendental unity of Reality with the empirical reality which admits of plurality within its fold. And above all, they either did not suspect the existence of, or deliberately disregarded, the minority of thinkers who pointed out that the classical Upanishads uniformly employ a device called the adhyārōpa-apavāda nyāya or the method of deliberate super-imposition and rescission, in order to bring the enquiring mind to the intuition of Reality which is forever ineffable and supra-rational.

The credit of formulating the above clear-cut distinction between the highly philosophical system of the traditional Vedānta and the theological systems with a realistic tinge, belongs to Gauḍapada and the credit of having presented it in its perfect form in consonance with the prasthānatraya belongs to S'aṅkara.

SECTION SEVEN

POST-S'AṄKARA SYSTEMS

1. Systems Independent of S'aṅkara

From chapter six onwards, the present work attempts to record the reaction of succeeding Vedāntins to S'aṅkara's formulation of advaita. Only two of these have tried to systematize the Upanishadic teaching independently, while all the others have written as professed followers of S'aṅkara. It is interesting to note that while neither of the founders of the two independent systems has any avowed followers in our own times, they have both powerfully influenced all subsequent thinking, in so much that there has been almost no Vedāntin who has not found it necessary to mould his thoughts in their pattern, or has not modified, revised or re-affirmed the traditional doctrines of his school even while opposing them.

Maṇḍana

Maṇḍana, the first of these two, was an advaitin who was perhaps a contemporary of S'aṅkara. In his magnum opus, the Brahma Siddhi (Br. S., p. 34), he refers to S'aṅkara's doctrine almost in the latter's very words, that 'one who has realized his identity with Brahman as a result of Vedic teaching, can no more be subject to the ills of worldly life, and one who is subject to these, has not evidently realized his identity with Brahman (SB., 1-1-4, p. 23)'. He then proceeds to propound his own doctrine that owing to impressions of wrong knowledge, which stay in the mind even after conviction of the non-dual nature of the Self, the soul may continue to be swayed by the influence of false appearances of duality, to blot out which the repeated practice of right knowledge is necessary. Simultaneous practice of sacrifice, gift and austerity as laid down in the S'rutis, precipitates the strengthening of his right impressions. Moreover, according to Maṇḍana, knowledge obtained through S'ruti is only indirect and therefore cannot remove the actual experience of differences and therefore meditation (nididhyāsana) or continued repetition of scriptural knowledge, is needed to bring on the direct realization of Ātman as he is. (Br. S., pp. 35 and 134.)

The reader will see that Maṇḍana has ignored the fundamental nature of Upanishadic teaching. The texts as we have learnt from S'aṅkara, do not teach us the nature of Ātman in the same way as a treatise on geography on studying which we necessarily have to travel and see for ourselves the nature of an island about which we seek information. They merly help us to shake off our mis-conceptions, or rather wrong ascriptions, by negativing them and reminding us of a self-existing and self-effulgent Brahman which is eternally identical with our own self. There can be therefore no question of denying or doubting, muchless of any attempt at reaching or realizing, that Brahman after one has achieved the intuition of his Brahmic nature. How are we to account for this persistence of Maṇḍana in holding to the pre-S'aṅkara view of the necessity of realization even after scriptural knowledge has been attained? Was he not aware of the traditional method? Not quite that, for he once mentions it by name and dismisses it as though it belonged to some other school of advaita. 'Tatha aparih, adhyarōpāpavādābhyām,nishprapañcam prapañcyate तथा अपरैः अध्यारोपापवादाभ्यां निष्प्रपञ्चं प्रपञ्चयते) 'So say others'. Evidently he could not appreciate the highly philosophic value of this method, for he never alludes to it again in all his work. Indeed, some of the principal dogmas of his school may be even supposed to be in opposition to the spirit of the Nyāya. I shall try to illustrate this point by citing a few of them.

1. Maṇḍana is considerably exercised over the determination of the nature, status, locus and distinctions of avidyā, That it is of two varieties, non-apprenension (agrahaṇam) and mis-apprehension (viparyaya-grahaṇam), that it is located in the Jīvas and not in Brahman, that the very birth of knowledge is its destruction and that, though beginningless and natural, it can be destroyed by vidyā, these and other contentions, he takes immense pains to prove analogically and on the strength of the S'rutis (Br. S., pp. 8, 11, 12, 13, 14, 20, 22, 32, 78, 121).

All this dialectic gymnastic could have been very well spared, had he only accepted S'aṅkara's indisputable definition of avidya as the mutual superimposition of the Self and the not-Self, for then he could have seen that avidyā, being the fundamental fault and the very condition that induces one to look upon oneself as a thinker prompted to determine the nature of things, it must perforce be itself outside the purview of all determinate views. Indeed, one is already under the clutches of avidyā even before he starts to determine its status. Most probably Maṇḍana thought that he could steer clear of S'aṅkara's formulation of avidyā as adhyāsa by adopting the nomenclature accepted by Gauḍapāda who divides it into kāraṇa-avidyā and kārya-avidyā (Br. S., p. 150); but he does not seem to have discerned that the latter ācārya meant that both these varieties of avidyā are the objects of the witnessing consciousness whose light falls upon them quite unaffected by either. Maṇḍana's critical acumen seems to fail him when he argues that avidyā and Jīva belong to a beginningless series like that of seeds and sprouts and that the avidyā of each preceding Jīva is responsible for the succeeding false imagination which presents the next Jīva in a series. For if avidyā be a term of a beginningless series of Jīvas and avidyās, it ceases to be avidyā in the genuine sense of the word, since it cannot account for the appearance of time, its own substrate.

2. Neglect of the principle that the fundamental super-imposition or avidya is a pre-supposition in the field where pramaṇas or logical canons obtain, compels Maṇḍana to take refuge in the mīmāṁsā dictum that the Vedas are eternal and not the production of any person. When he argues that on this score they naturally carry a stronger validity than perception and other pramaṇas which on the strength of the S'ruti itself (!) may be inferred to be tainted with the impression of avidyā. He has to suppose further that this inferred impression of avidya being stable, does not affect the efficiency of perception and other canons as means of empirical knowledge. Recognition of the principle of antya-pramāṇam - the nature of S'ruti being the ultimate pramāṇa which sublates all distinctions of means and objects of knowledge, as explained on a previous occasion, might have stood Maṇḍana in good stead here, for it would have saved him the invoking of the un-philosophic postulate that Pramāṇas can be mutually opposed. The lengthy criticism of the concept of 'difference' undertaken in the second chapter could have been altogether dispensed with if only, in the empirical field, pramāṇas were recognized as never in conflict with one another.

3. Maṇḍana's anxiety to establish the validity of the Śruti is responsible for his far-fetched justification of its efficiency to teach the nature of Brahman. In the face of an express statement by the Śruti itself, that neither words nor the mind can objectify Brahman, he argues that " a word in the Veda, whose meaning we know through other sources, placed in collocation with other words denoting certain characteristics of Brahman, can and does denote Brahman and by that means a passage can and does convey a peculiar trait of Brahman not ascertainable through any other means of knowledge. Thus, for instance, the cause in general or being in general which we know through perception or other means, may become the object of the Śruti passage 'yatō vā यतो वा' (Tai., 3-1) ; or ' asthūlam anaṇu अस्थूलमनणु '(Bṛ.) in a special form by reason of its being related to or differentiated from things known through other words. Or else Brahman being really the object of every concept, for the reason that there is nothing else than Brahman to be known, says Maṇḍana, the Śruti only negatives the manifold. Both the manifold and negation being knowables, their mutual connection in the Śruti can very well convey the absence of the world of differences (Br. S., p. 157). It is obvious that the recognition of the principle that the concept of pramāṇa itself lies within the sphere of avidyā, and Brahman in itself, though indeterminate, is forever intuited by each one of us as ourself, could have saved him all this needless exegetical feat.

4. In discussing the immediate effect of Brahma-jñāna, Maṇḍana remarks that the knower would attain release immediately after he shuffles off his mortal coil. This departure from the body would be sooner or later according to the rigour of one's karma to be exhausted. According to this philosopher there are two alternatives which we may predicate of a person who lives on for some time after he has acquired the knowledge of Brahman. Either he is yet practising the meditation needful for the complete realization, which becomes perfected at the time of death, or else, he is really a perfect soul whose dealings in life - even while they appear to be just like those of the ignorant-have this point of difference that the wise one is not obsessed with the idea of their reality (Br. S., 131-132).

This pathetically realistic description of one who has realized the truth, betrays a woeful disregard of the two standpoints of view which a student of the Upanishads, has constantly to bear in mind. For, from the transcendental point of view, there is no body, mind or senses limiting any one, since all distinctions are nought, the only reality being Brahman, or Ātman. From the empirical view, the jñāni is only one among other egoes, while he is a miracle in the eyes of seekers of knowledge. The experience of the sthithaprajña described in the Gīta, can never be exactly defined in empirical terms. From the transcendental point of view, there is no question of the jñāni leaving behind him the body or an independent objective world, for it never existed for him. The idea that he deals with other egoes and that the world goes on even after his departure, is true enough empirically, but it ean never affect Reality as it is.

The account given here of Maṇḍana's school will be enough to show the difference between the traditional method of Vedānta exhibited by Śaṅkara and the method or methods employed by the Post-Śaṅkaras. For Maṇḍana's method may be taken to be typical of all. Profession of the authority of scriptures and quoting them with interpretations so as to suit one's own dogmatic views is the uniform line adopted throughout. For fear of prolixity, I refer the reader to the Sanskrit original for details.

BHĀSKARA

Bhāskarācārya is the only other teacher who has struck out a new path of his own in interpreting Vedānta. Although his complete works are not available, his Sūtra-Bhāshya which has been printed, is quite sufficient for the purpose of assessing his views and method.

While his school belongs to the bheda-abheda school of Vedānta, it differs from that of Bhartṛ-Prapañca in so many respects that one is tempted to surmise that he belongs to some other ancient branch of the school which has left no record behind as to its career. His system has been examined in the body of the present work (pp. 337-393) at some length. The chief value of his system lies in his pungent criticisms of the later interpretations of Śaṅkara's advaita as represented by the author of the Pañca-pādika and the legacy of doctrines that he has left to the succeeding opponents of Śaṅkara's advaita. We shall have occasion to consider his system again while discussing the Vaishṇava-Vedānta systems in the second volume.

2. S'AŃKARA'S FOLLOWERS

(1) SURES'WARA

Interpreters of S'aṅkara have to be divided into two main groups, the first of which has Sures'wara as its main representative. It is perhaps an irony of fate that the study of Sures'vara's extant works, invaluable guides as they are for a clear grasp of the fundamentals of Vedānta, has become almost obsolete, except for the lip-homage evinced by modern Vedāntins in the shape of a sprinkling of a few well-known quotations from the Vārtikas, mostly in service of their respective views foisted on that great ācārya. I have, therefore, devoted a considerable portion of the present book (pp. 210-276) to a discussion of his important views.

Sures'vara's Vārtika is aptly called by that name, for it answers to the lexicographical description of the title in all respects (uktā-anukta-durukta-cintā उक्तानुक्त-दुरुक्तचिन्ता), since the author especially in his Bṛhad-āraṇyaka Vārtika not only clarifies and amplifies all that has been said in the Bhāshya but very frequently states his personal views regarding the subject-matter as well as the manner of interpretation. The critical student will therefore be greatly profited by a careful and diligent study of his thought-stimulating work.

The essential teachings of Sures'vara concerning Vedānta are identical with those of S'aṅkara. I shall therefore state very briefly what has been given at greater length in the body of the present work. Ātman is of the nature of pure intuition itself and therefore (anubhavamātrātmakatvāt अनुभवमात्रात्मकत्वात्) needs no means of right knowledge to establish his nature. He is in fact the prius and the source from which the knower and the means of knowing as well as the objects of knowledge derive their breath (Nai. 1-89, Bṛ. V., 1-4-874). Strictly speaking, Śruti is the one pramaṇa and the Ātman the only prameya. There is really one avidyā or ajñāna (ignorance) which obscures the true nature of Ātman, the only unknown. The knowledge ordinarily regarded as resulting from the application of pratyaksha and other pramāṇas, is itself the object to be known according to Vedānta (SVa., 159).[1] The manifold world is only an appearance, as Gauḍapada has rightly remarked, of the unknown Ātman in the same way as the snake, line of water etc., are all mere illusory appearanees imagined in the rope (Bṛ.V. 2-1-2) Hence the Veda is pramāṇa, not because it is the Veda but because of the absence of all factors which might he suspected to vitiate the validity of the knowledge arising from it (Bṛ. V, 2-4-325).

In texts like 'That thou art', the collocation or opposition of the two words 'that' and 'thou', the mutual relation of the qualifier and the qualified between the entities denoted by these words and the consequent cancellation of the seemingly contradictory implications such as the individual self being miserable and Brahman being something to be known mediately – these are the successive stages of the psychological process culminating in the revelation of the absolute identity of the two entities indicated by the two words. The intuition being transcendental, and Brahman being of the nature of pure consciousness which is our very self, there is no need of any extraneous means of right knowledge (para 116).

1. The abbreviation SVa., stands for Sambanadha Vartika on the Bṛhadaranyaka-

I have examined the several sub-varieties or modes of the Vedantic method - as applied to causality, the five kōs'as, the knower and the known, the three states of consciousness etc., — at great length (paras 118 to 122) to show how Sures'vara closely follows in the footsteps of S'aṅkara in almost all details in this respect. As regards one or two points in particular, Sures'vara appears at first sight to be quite independent. In the first place, his division of avidyā into absence of knowledge and wrong knowledge, is liable to be mistaken for a similar division adopted by Maṇḍana, while his emphasis on the former only as avidyā proper, is likely to mislead one to think that he breaks off his fidelity to his master in this respect. But this divergence is more apparent than real, for Sures'vara, unlike Maṇḍana, takes care to lay special stress on the distinction between empirical ignorance and this beginningless ignorance of Brahman by insisting that it is 'anubhavavedya' or intuited, and 'avicāra-siddha' appearing only in the state of non-discrimination and that it never exists from the higher standpoint. He quotes the Gauḍapāda's Karika 'aniscitā yathā rajjuh अनिश्चिता यथा रज्जुः' (just like a rope un-ascertained as such etc., G. K., 2-17)[1] again and again. This Kārikā, the reader will remember, avers that all empirical world is a super-imposition on Ātman like the snake etc., which are super-imposed upon a rope not ascertained to be such. He never troubles himself like Maṇḍana with the unphilosophical question 'to whom does avidyā pertain ? Is it Brahman or Jīva that is ignorant ? '. No doubt he once admits that ignorance can belong only to a conscious being (Nai. III) but that is only to repudiate the suggestion that even insentient things can be 'un-conscious' or 'un-known as is vulgarly imagined. As for Maṇḍana's contention that ignorance cannot be possibly supposed to reside in Brahman who is all-knowledge, Sureśvara rebuts it by remarking that this objection can be raised neither by one who is ignorant of the nature of Brahman since he does not know that he is ignorant, nor by the enlightened one, since from his view-point ignorance never exists (Nai. III-116).

1. Gaudapada's Karikas on the Mandukya.

अतः प्रमाणतोऽशक्याऽविद्याऽस्येति वीक्षितुम् ।
कीदृशी वा कुतो वाऽसावनुभूत्येकरूपतः ॥

"In fact one can never know ignorance as belonging to any one, neither determine its nature nor conceive how it can possibly be at all; for it is essentially of the nature of pure intuition itself" (Sambandha Vārtika, 184).

I have discussed this question more fully in the body of the work, and shown how the distinction of kāraṇavidya and kāryāvidyā itself presupposes the basic adhyāsa and how Sureśvara also admits this (p. 223) indirectly. We have therefore to conclude that in setting his face against mithyājñāna (wrong knowledge) as avidyā, Sureśvara was only thinking of 'mis-conception' upheld by the mīmāṁsa and other schools and not of the adhyāsa advocated by Śaṅkara.

It is sometimes urged that Sureśvara actually argues against the two kinds of nescience recognized by Maṇḍana. While it is true, as I have already explained, that the Vārtikakāra lays emphasis on ignorance as non-apprehension as contrasted with mis-apprehension, I think that he is not particularly against giving false knowledge also its own place as avidyā. He only means to say that, but for the ignorance of the negative type, there could be no false knowledge at all, since it is by reason of our not knowing a thing as it is, that we mistake it for something else.

अज्ञानं संशयज्ञानं मिथ्याज्ञानमिति त्रिकम् ।
अज्ञानं कारणं तत्र कार्यत्वं परिशिष्टयोः ॥ बृ. वा. १-४-१३६८.

Here both doubt and false knowledge are declared to be the effect of ignorance properly so called.

It is, however, necessary to repeat that, speaking from a higher point of view, Sures'vara holds that Ātman is the only unknown entity and it is therefore wrong to speak of the not-self as either known or unknown (para 114) since it is nothing but the display of avidyā and therefore nothing but avidyā (Tai. V., 2-178, 179). In this sense, therefore, there is only one avidyā. It is from this standpoint too, that he vehemently argues (para 113) against the unwarranted distinction made by the Prasaṅkhyanavādins, between the adventitious ignorance of empirical objects which can be obliterated for ever by true knowledge, and the inherent ignorance enveloping Ātman, which they feared to be likely to crop up again even after its destruction by knowledge.

The other point of seeming difference between S'aṅkara and Sures'vara, is with regard to nididhyāsana. While S'aṅkara takes it as a means to be practised for the attainment of realization, Sures'vara thinks that it is the resulting intuition itself since it is paraphrased in the S'ruti by the word vijñāna. Notwithstanding this conflict of opinions in exegesis, there is no divergence between the two teachers about the final teaching, since even Sures'vara admits that meditation is also a means of realization. The reader is referred to the body of the work (para 125) for further details bearing on this reconciliation.

On the whole, Sureśvara remains a staunch advocate of Śaṅkara's tradition, supplementing his teachings with arguments based on the Śruti invariably appealing to universal intuition and defending his position against all un-Vedāntic encroachments.

(2) Padmapāda

An important innovation in Śaṅkara's system was introduced by the fragment of a commentary on his Śārīraka-Bhāshya. This commentary called the 'Pañcapādikā', literally a treatise explaining the first five pādas of the sūtras, actually ends with the gloss on the fourth Sūtra. Tradition uniformly ascribes the work to Padmapāda, the reputed immediate disciple of Śaṅkara, but neither the author nor his glossators afford any clue enabling us either to fix the identity of the writer or to explain the incomplete nature of the work.

The author, whoever he was, boldly sets forward with the doctrine of those whom Maṇḍana calls 'avidyōpādānabhedavādinah' (Br. S., p. 10) or the ancient school of Vedāntins who taught that all empirical phenomena are the effect of avidyā the primordial material cause. He believes that Śaṅkara belongs to that school and accordingly in his interpretations of the Bhāshya, gives an altogether new turn to the arguments put forth by Śaṅkara. The most famous of such forced interpretations is his explanation of the very first sentence of the Bhāshya, wherein we find the following clause.

मिथ्याज्ञाननिमित्तः सत्यानृते मिथुनीकृत्य अहमिदं ममेदमिति नैसर्गिकोऽयं लोकव्यवहारः ॥

" It is a natural procedure on the part of men due to wrong knowledge to mix up the real and the unreal and to think 'I am this', 'This is mine'. This commentator, however, stretches the meaning of the word mithyājñāna to mean something which squares with the creed peculiar to his own school :—

> मिथ्याज्ञाननिमित्तः इति । मिथ्या च तद्ज्ञानं च मिथ्याज्ञानम् 'मिथ्या' इति अनिर्वचनीयता उच्यते । अज्ञानमिति च जडात्मिका अविद्याशक्तिः ज्ञानपर्युदासेनोच्यते । तन्निमित्तः तदुपादान इत्यर्थः ॥

"The compound word 'mithyājñāna' is made up of the words 'mithyā' and 'ajñāna'. Mithyā means anirvacanīya and 'ajñāna' means the insentient potentiality of avidyā, as opposed to jñāna or sentiency. Adhyāsa has this avidyāśakti for its 'nimitta' i.e., upādāna or material cause. This is the meaning." (PP., 4).

Comment is needless.

Further on, the author enumerates a number of terms as synonymous ; nāma-rūpa (name and form), avyākṛtam (undifferentiated state), avidyā (nescience), māyā (false appearance), prakṛtih (original cause), agrahaṇam (non-apprehension), avyaktam (unmanifested), tamah (darkness), kāraṇam (cause), layah(dissolution), śaktih (potency), mahāsuptih (the long sleep or dream), nidra (sleep), aksharam (imperishable), ākāśam (ether). It is clear that the word avidyā which, derived as it is from the root vid to know, can primarily express only something epistemic, is here requisitioned to denote a causative something. Most of its synonymes here shown, indeed, are uniformly used by Vedāntins for the subtle state of the manifested world. And Śaṅkara not only never mixes up this avyākṛta or māyā with avidyā, as is here done, but expressly says that it is really a figment of avidyā.

Witness the following passage :—

सर्वज्ञस्येश्वरस्य आत्मभूते इवाविद्याकल्पिते नामरूपे तत्त्वान्यत्वाभ्या-मनिर्वचनीये संसारप्रपञ्चबीजभूते सर्वज्ञस्येश्वरस्य माया, शक्तिः, प्रकृतिः – इति च श्रुतिस्मृत्योरभिलप्येते ॥

" Name and form imagined by avidyā as though they were identical with the omniscient Īs'vara, but difficult to define either as identical with or different from Him, are the seed of the manifold world of mundane existence. They are called in the S'ruti and the Smṛti the 'māyā', 'power' of the omniscient Īs'vara and 'Prakṛti'. " (SB., 2-1-14, p. 201).

It is evident that the author is bent upon interpreting S'aṅkara's system which aims at showing that in vyavahāra all views of Reality as conceived by the human mind are due to avidyā, in the light of his own pet doctrine that all adhyāsa is an evolution of the causative seed called by him 'avidyā'. Accordingly he writes :

चैतन्यस्य स्वत एवावस्थितब्रह्मस्वरूपावभासं प्रतिबध्य जीवत्वापादिका विद्याकर्मपूर्वप्रज्ञासंस्कारचित्रभित्तिः सुषुप्ते प्रकाशाच्छादनविक्षेपसंस्कारमात्र-रूपस्थितिः अनाद्यविद्या ॥

" This beginningless avidyā obstructs the shining forth of the inherent nature of conciousness as being one with Brahman and brings on to it the state of Jīva. It is the canvas on which is painted the impression of knowledge, action and past experience[1], and abides in deep sleep in the only form of ācchādana envelopement covering the light of consciousness and the subtle form of vikshepa or projection of false appearances." (PP., 20).

1. The original as found in the printed books has the variant reading 'avidya-karma-purnaprajna' and this is endorsed by the sub-commentary the Vivarana. Actually, however, this phrase is a reference to the Bṛhadaranyaka (4-4-2) where we read 'vidya-karmani samanvarabhete purvaprajna cha'.

And what is the warrant for the assumption of this avidyā ? The Pañcapādika replies : "This avidyā-śakti should necessarily be assumed to reside in external and internal things (the individual selves and the external objects), as being attached to their very essential being, for otherwise no false thing could appear. And it does not obstruct the nature of inert things from appearing forth, for their being not apprehended can be the result of the absence of a means of their knowledge and also because the nature of a thing like the shell can be known both before and after the sublation of the appearance of false silver, notwithstanding the existance of avidyā throughout. Hence avidyā is only responsible for the appearance of an objective thing in another form. But in the case of the inner self, which is of the nature of consciousness and hence self-luminous, its being not known to be Brahman cannot be accounted for in any other way and hence its not being known as such is due solely to the natural avidyā which inheres in it. Hence it obstructs the shining forth of the Brahmic nature in the internal conscious self and becomes the occasion of its false appearance as the ego etc., and in deep sleep and other similar states it stays in the shape of merely the subtle form of the ego etc., and resumes its shape again". PP., 4, 5.

The above long passage is enough to convince the reader that the author of the Pañcapādika is eager to show that according to Śaṅkara avidyā is an ontological rather than an epistemic principle accounting for the false appearance of the empirical world. Accordingly he twists even the definition of adhyāsa or super-imposition and interprets it as though it described something super-imposed rather than the mental process of super-imposing. He is aware, however, that S'aṅkara later on explains himself in unmistakable terms 'adhyāsō nāma atasmin tadbuddhih iti avōcāma अध्यासो नाम अतस्मिन् तद्बुद्धिरित्यवोचाम'. We have already said that 'adhyāsa, super-imposition, means mistaking something to be what it is not.' He therefore, hastens to add 'arthāt tadvishayasya avabhāsasyāpi idameva lakshanam uktam अर्थात् तद्विषयस्याप्यवभासस्य इदमेव लक्षणम् उक्तम्' (perforce, this may also be taken as the definition of the knowledge of such an object). That is to say, according to this explanation, S'aṅkara is not primarily thinking of an inherent error that assails the human mind, but only of something objective falsely appearing in place of another !

It is needless to multiply instances of text-torturing to force one's own meaning into S'aṅkara's words so as to fit in with this theory of avidyā, not a trace of which is to be found in all that teacher's classical works. Needless to say that it is a travesty of Maṇḍana's terminology to describe this hypothetical avidyā as anirvacanīya, and no more than a make-believe of a commentary on S'aṅkara to say that this is what that great Vedāntin meant to place before us in his famous introduction to the Sūtras, as the source of all ills to be destroyed by the knowledge of the one Ātman.

The Pañcapādika is glaringly divergent from S'aṅkara's system in its description of avidyā on at least three fundamental points :

1. S'aṅkara appeals to reason based upon universal intuition when he says that neither thinking nor action is possible without the basic super-imposition of adhyāsa or avidyā and thence deduces the corollary that all pramāṇas pre-suppose this avidyā before they function. The Pañcapādikā, on the other hand, appeals to a logical necessity which is supposed to compel us to believe that a certain force, or principle called 'avidyā-śakti' is inherent in all things internal or external – that is to say in thinking subjects and the objects of thought – and tries to prove this by means of pramāṇas (PP., 4, 5, 14).

2. Śaṅkara wants to show how all the ills of saṁsāra are due to the fundamental super-imposition otherwise called avidyā and hence that right knowledge alone of the one Ātman who is the sole Reality, can effectively remove avidyā. The commentary, on the other hand, holds that causal avidyā is to be postulated to rest in Jīva (arthāt Jīve Brahma svarūpaprakāśācchādikā avidyā kalpyate) covering its Brahmic nature. And later on, inconsistently enough, identifies avidyā with adhyāsa (PP., 30) most probably because knowledge cannot be rightly held to remove anything objective directly.

3. Śaṅkara refers to various theories of adhyāsa just to show how all are ultimately agreed that something is mistaken for something else and cites two common examples of illusion which illustrate what he means. The Pañcapādikā, however, enters upon a tediously long discussion to refute all views other than the theory of anirvacanīya-khyāti which is elaborated at great length, never invoking the support of the Bhāshya for any of the opinions advanced in that connection (PP., 7-9.). This wild-goose chase was necessitated perhaps by the predilection of the commentator for the objective view of adhyāsa (arthādhyāsa) already referred to. He insists that 'ahaṅkārādhyasa' is the effect of the postulated material cause avidyāśakti, in defiance of Śaṅkara's express statement at the very commencement of the Introduction, that the notions of me and mine, are the result of the basic superimposition 'adhyāsya itaretarāvivekena mithyājñānanimittah .... aham idam mama idam – iti naisargikōyam lōka-vyavahārah अध्यस्य इतरेतराविवेकेन मिथ्याज्ञाननिमित्तः .... 'अहमिदं ममेदम्' इति नैसर्गिकोऽयं लोकव्यवहारः' (para 137).

The above tenet not only militated against the express statement of Śaṅkara that 'the natural adhyāsa the nature of a false notion has no assignable limit prior or posterior (ayam anādiranantō naisargikōdhyāsō mithyā-pratyarūpah अयमनादिरनन्तो नैसर्गिकोऽध्यासो मिथ्याप्रत्ययरूपः) but also added another weak link to the chain of dogmatics required to support it, for the fact that a knower of Brahman continues to exhibit the knot of egoity (ahaṅkāra-granthi) had to be justified by the assumption that this avidyā even after its destruction by vidyā continues, owing to saṁskāra, to produce the knot in question very much like fear which continues to produce trembling etc., even after one's error of mistaking a rope for a snake is over (PP., 40). This unhappy alliance with Maṇḍana brought on more un-philosophic positions in its train (para 15).

Maxmuller's observations regarding avidya deserve to be reproduced here in this connection.

" No wonder that with all these ambiguities about the phenomenally real and the really real, different schools even in India should have differed in their views about avidyā, and that European scholars also should have failed to form a clear idea of that creative nescience of which we can neither say that it is or that it is not. Avidyā like all other words, has had a history. In the Upanishads it is often used in the simple sense of ignorance, and opposed to Vidyā. Both are in that sense simply subjective. ... In some of the later Upanishads this nescience or Ignorance assumes a more independent character and even a new name viz Māyā. It is thus no longer the nescience of the individual, but the result of that universal Nescience, which is the cause of what we should call the phenomenal world. Thus we read in the Swet. Up., (IV, 10), 'Know Prakṛti (nature) as Māyā (magic), and the great Lord as Mayin (magician)'. Though, this is not pure Vedānta, it shows us, at all events, the way by which ignorance of the individual became the cause of what we call objective reality, and led, at the same time, to the admission of an active and creative Lord, the personal Brahma or Īs'vara, how avidyā in fact became a S'akti or potentia, somehow or other related to Brahman itself. " (SS., 211-213).

These observations require modification at least in one respect. No Upanishad quoted by S'aṅkara has treated avidyā and māyā as identical and no Vedāntin is seen interchanging the two terms till we come down to the time of Maṇḍana who says (Br.S., p. 9) that avidyā is also called 'māyā' and 'mithyāvabhāsa' (false appearance or knowledge). It was the author of the Pañcapādikā, however, who called the Prakṛti or the seed form of names and forms which make up the world by the names 'avidyā' and 'ajñāna' and proclaimed it to be the material cause of adhyāsa, for the first time, so far as we know. There is reason to believe that this cult of objective avidyā was older than Maṇḍana, who quotes (Br.S., p. 10), a statement not to be found in the Pañcapādikā. In any case, the Pañcapādikā is the first work in which a sustained effort is made to argue that this school has the hearty support of Śaṅkara.

3. Vācaspati Miśra

Bhāskarācārya's attack on Śaṅkara's system as modified by the Pañcapādikā, naturally evoked a strong reaction from the exponents of the avidyā-māyā doctrine. The first of such defenders of Śaṅkara, was Vacaspati whose sub-commentary the Bhāmatī inaugurates a version of Śaṅkara's system widely different from the one presented by the Pañcapādikā ; for instead of staking his all on the objective avidyā, he tries to graft Maṇḍana's views on Śaṅkara's system in so far as that is feasible, but indirectly accedes to the opinion of the objective-avidya school while keeping his fidelity to Śaṅkara's adhyāsa doctrine also. In fact this Miśra's advaita is an amalgam of the thoughts of all the three systems.

Thus he walks close on the heels of Maṇḍana in so far as the latter's system postulates two avidyās- cause and effect- both declared to be anirvacanīya (para 182). In almost all instances of his defence of Śaṅkara against the attacks of Bhāskarācārya, we find that the anirvacanīyavāda is the one handy weapon un-sheathed to repulse the opponent. The question of the locus of avidyā also is solved after the manner of Maṇḍana (para 186).

He incorporates Maṇḍana's modified Prasaṅkhyāna theory too, but he rejects (VB., 1-1-1) the latter's samuccaya-vāda or doctrine of conjoined practice of both knowledge and works as too palpably against Śaṅkara's un-compromising position.

On the other hand, he leans towards the objective-avidyā theory when he declares (VB., 1-3-30, p. 333) that at the time of absolute dissolution ('Mahā-pralaya-Samaye') the mind and other phenomena are dissolved in their cause the anirvacyāvidyā (svakāraṇe anirvācya-avidyāyām līnāh स्वकारणे अनिर्वाच्याविद्यायां लीनाः) and abide there in a subtle potential form along with the impressions of avidyā which are the tendencies to the projection of actions (sūkshmeṇa s'aktirūpeṇa karmavikshepakāvidyāvāsanābhih saha avatishthanta eva सूक्ष्मेण शक्तिरूपेण कर्मविक्षेपकाविद्यावासनाभिः सह अवतिष्ठन्त एव) and even elaborates that theory by an additional doctrine of his own that there are as many avidyās as there are individual selves[1] (para 187), whence according to him it follows that only his avidyā is destroyed who has realized his true nature, and not of others since there is no opposition between the vidyā that has dawned to one and the avidyās which belong to other souls. That Vācaspati Mis'ra wholly aligns with the objective-avidyā-vādins in this respect, is placed beyond all doubt by this statement: 'The singular number is only used by courtesy for avyakta or avyākṛta, simply because all avidyā-s'aktis are one as avidyā". ('avidyātvamātreṇa ca ekatvōpacārah avyaktam iti ca avyākṛtam iti ca अविद्यात्वमात्रेण च एकत्वोपचारः 'अव्यक्तम्' इति च 'अव्याकृतम्' इति च ॥) VB., p. 378.

At the same time he manages to find an egress out of the maze of the doctrine of objective avidyā,

1. Prof. Dasgupta refers to Gunaratna's Tarka-rahasya Dipika, where that author mentions two schools of Sankhya, the maulikya (original) and the Uttara (later). "Of these the doctrine of Maulikya sankhyas is said to be that which believed that there was a separate Pradhana for each atmau (maulikya sankhya hi atmanam atmanam prati prithak pradhanam vadanti)" (HIP. Vol I, 217). Vacaspati Misra does not seem to have been aware of this fact, for he claims that 'unlike the Sankhyas' Vedantins maintain avidya to be a different one for each Jiva (VB., 377).

since he agrees with Śaṅkara that adhyāsa is the only avidyā (pratyagātmani anātmādhyāsa eva anarthahetuh, na punā rajatādivibhramā iti sa eva avidyā प्रत्यगात्मन्यनात्माध्यास एव अनर्थहेतुः, न पुना रजतादिविभ्रमा इति स एव अविद्या VB. 1-1-1, p. 40) and can write without any qualm of conscience in Śaṅkara's very words that the differentiated (vyākṛta) and the undifferentiated (avyākṛta) names and forms constituting the world, are both figments of avidyā.

अविद्याकल्पितेन तु नामरूपलक्षणेन रूपभेदेन व्याकृताव्याकृतात्मना तत्त्वान्यत्त्वाभ्यामनिर्वचनीयेन परिणामादिसर्वव्यवहारास्पदत्वं ब्रह्म प्रतिपद्यते। न च कल्पितं रूपं वस्तु स्पृशति ॥ (वा· भा· २-१-२५, पा· ४७५).

It is interesting to note that even while taking adhyāsa as the only avidyā this thinker fails to appreciate the beginningless nature of avidyā which Śaṅkara enunciates at the end of his introduction to the Sūtra Bhāshya and has to harp on Maṇḍana's device of the seed and sprout series whenever the beginninglessness of avidyā is spoken of. Thus he explains in Śaṅkara's phrase 'anādih' by remarking

(१) जीवात्मा इतरेतराध्यासोपादानः, तदुपादानश्च अध्यासः – इत्यनादित्वात् बीजाङ्कुरवत् नेतरेतराश्रयत्वम् इत्युक्तं भवति ॥

And in defending his theory of different avidyās for different jīvas, he writes :

(२) न च अविद्योपाधिभेदाधीनो जीवभेदो जीवभेदाधीनश्च अविद्योपाधिभेद इति परस्पराश्रयात् उभयासिद्धिरिति सांप्रतम्। अनादित्वात् बीजाङ्कुरवत्, उभयसिद्धेः (VB., p. 378).

In both of the abov einstances Vācaspati Miśra maintains like Maṇḍana that avidyā and the nature of Jīva each belong to a beginningless series whose previous avidyā of Jīva accounts for the succeeding one.

Vācaspati Miśra is a learned scholar and a versatile author conversant with all the Darśanas, and in his erudite commentary we find many thoughts of darśanas other than Vedanta coalesce into a whole which claims to represent Śaṅkara's system. The reader is referred to the body of the present work for some thought-arresting instances.

4. Vimuktātman

Vācaspati's liberality in incorporating Maṇḍana's views with Śaṅkara's views was naturally resented by the followers of the strictly objective-avidyā school who claimed to be the sole representatives of Śaṅkara's advaita and noticeable reaction was soon to follow. Vimuktātman was the first champion of the latter school to make out a strong case in their favour. He produced an independent polemical work called the Ishta Siddhi which attempted to base the doctrine of causal avidyā or māyā on surer foundations by taking its stand on anubhūti or pure Intuitive Consciousness on which the entire phenomenal universe of māyā is painted (IS., p. 35).

This māyā or avidyā is, as we have already learnt from the Pañcapādikā, undefinable either as being or non-being, and resting as it does according to Vimuktātman on Pure Consciousness is as insecure as darkness resting in the thousand-rayed sun or coldness resting in fire (IS., p. 35), for it is neither identical with nor different from Brahman (IS., p. 36).

Unlike the author of the Pañcapādikā, Vimuktātman refuses to go in search of a pramāṇa for maya for he declares straight away that the world is a product of Māyā or avidyā like the illusory or 'anirvāchya' silver seen in the mother of pearl (IS., p. 39). At the same time he has to maintain this anirvacanīya-khyāti theory as against the ātmakhyāti (of the Vijñāna-vādins), the akhyāti (of the Mimāṁsakas), the anyathākhyāti (of the Naiyāyikas) and the asatkhyāti of the mādhyamikas) and a considerable portion of the work (pp. 39-323) is devoted to the refutation of these opponents by means of logical arguments leading to the conclusion that the illusory silver being anirvacanīyā demands a material cause of the same nature. This cause is to be admitted to be no other than the beginningless avidya (IS., p. 48).

It is interesting to note that in the course of this discussion the author dismisses the notion entertained in the Pañcapādika that avidyā may have external objects like the pearl-oyster also for its locus since the appearance of false silver etc., must be traced to a cause. He argues that the same ajñāna which rests in Ātman may very well serve as the cause of these false appearances (IS., pp. 56-57).

Ignorance according to the Ishta Siddhi is never completely removed so long as there remains some inert thing.

Notwithstanding that vidyā is itself the product of ignorance, Vimuktātman contends that it is not inconsistent that avidyā can be destroyed by knowledge in the same way as bamboos are sometimes burnt up by fire produced by their own friction (IS., p. 69). Gradual removal of portions of this avidyā as it were, by different grades of knowledge is, according to the Ishta Siddhi, quite conceivable since the Śruti has recommended various means of their removal (IS., pp. 73-74). Even after avidyā has been completely destroyed, it is to be presumed that some vestige of it is left over as long as the wise man bears the body since śrutis and smṛtis teach two kinds of mukti, Jīvanmukti (freedom in this very life) and Videha-mukti, release after death (IS., p. 77).

The absolute disappearance of avidyā is neither being nor non-being; it cannot be both, since that is a self-contradictory notion; nor is it anirvacanīya, for the removal of anything anirvacanīya cannot itself be of the same status. Hence the total disappearance of avidyā is of the fifth variety (IS., 85-86). It would be more exact to say, however, that the destruction of ignorance is destruction and nothing else (IS., p. 369), and therefore their need be no discussion as to its status. This destruction is really Ātman himself known as such (IS., p. 369, 372).

Vimuktātman is a staunch opponent of Maṇḍana's and Vācaspati's theory that the locus of avidyā is Jīva and not Brahman. He resolutely maintains that Brahman is both the locus and the object of the anirvacanīyāvidyā. The whole of the sixth chapter is a sustained attack of the opponent's position in all its bearings as well as a staunch defence of his own doctrine.

The verses (VIII, 25 to 28) at the close of the work summing up its chief teachings leave us in no doubt of the object of this work which has been aptly entitled 'Ishta Siddhi'.

"There is mukti and that is to be attained by knowledge, which alone is capable of destroying ignorance. Ignorance resides in Ātman and to him alone accrues the fruit of destruction, leaving Ātman alone in the end. Ātman is one, free from action, infinite, secondless, of the nature of intuitive consciousness, untainted by ignorance or its effects, resting in himself, the light of lights, self-effulgent. The highest bliss desired by all can be known only through the Ātman taught in Vedānta. And this as known to the knowers of the Vedas is particularly what I have aimed at. Now, this doctrine can be established if avidyā is anirvacanīya. It is therefore that I have enquired into the nature of that avidyā, in order to achieve the desired end (IS., p. 378).

The Vedāntic system of the objective avidyā school as formulated in the Pancapādikā may be considered to have been reformed, fortified by logical arguments and placed on a surer footing by the Is'ta-Siddhi than ever before. Vedānta became more and more dialectic hence-forward, as may be seen from a study of its later developments.

5. Prakās'ātman

Prakas'atman the disciple of Ananyānubhava is the most celebrated of the successors of Padmapāda the reputed author of the Pañcapādikā. In his production, the famous Pañcapādikā-Vivaraṇa he consolidated almost all that had been said before him on behalf of the objective avidyā and made contributions of his own in such an authoritative manner, that this line of thought is now known mostly as belonging to the 'Vivaraṇa School' thus almost supplanting the Pancapādikā and the Ishta Siddhi.

In endeavouring to perfect the teachings of the anirvacanīyāvidyā school, Prakās'ātman introduced many remarkable changes into the system. The chief innovations and improvements for which he is responsible may be summed up as follows :

(1) In disregard of the Pañcapādikā and the Bhāmatī which taught that texts dealing with S'ravaṇa, manana, and nidhidhyāsanā were only arthavāda, eulogies, in the guise of injunctions and in defiance of S'aṅkara's express statement that Brahman is not taught as subservient to any injunction, (SB. 1-1-4, p. 23), Prakās'ātman avers that s'ravaṇa or study of the scriptures is enjoined as a means to be practised for the realization of Brahman, and that the very first sūtra of Bādarāyaṇa is meant to discuss the nature and implications of this injunction (V., p. 3).

(2) While agreeing with the Pancapādikā in holding that the anirvacanīya-avidyā is the material cause of false appearances, the Vivaraṇa makes it explicit that both the false appearance and its knowledge are due to that avidyā, and supports its views very much on the lines of the Ishta Siddhi (V., p. 14).

(3) Two more pramāṇas are adduced to prove the necessity of the postulated radical-avidyā (V., p. 13). The argument is on the whole a clearer statement and amplification of what the Pañcapādikā and the Ishtasiddhi have said. Inference of avidyā in sleep from the waking memory, avidyā as distinct from non-apprehension, mis-apprehension and its impressions (V., p. 16), the different ways of explaining the origin (V., p. 21), and sublation of Prātibhāsika (apparent) objects (V., p. 14), as well as the discussion of the ingredient factors which give rise to such objects (V.. p. 29), the likening of the contact of ignorance and Ātman to the black colour superimposed on the sky (V., p. 17), the enunciation of the three grades of being (V., p. 31), emphasis on considerations which compel one to identify avidyā and māyā (V., pp. 31, 32), and the justification of adducing pramāṇas for avidyā directly intuited by the witnessing Ātman (V., 43) - these are some of the features which have tended to make the Mūlāvidyā Theory more rigorous than before. Prakāśātman's treatment of deep sleep, his postulate of three different limiting conditions of Jīva in the three different states of consciousness, the theory of three different cidābhāsas in the ignorance obtaining in the three different states which accounts for the memory of sleep experience (V., pp. 44, 56, 57, 58, 66) are distinct contributions which strengthened the position of this school.

(4) The function of tarka or reasoning has been elaborated and some original doctrines added on to those found in the Pañcapādikā. Prakāśātman evidently struggles very hard to maintain his position that the Śruti alone can produce direct cognition of Brahman and in doing so he stretches the meaning of the word 'tarka'; for, according to him, it means in the first place (1) reasoning which succeeds in removing the suspected improbability or falsity of what is taught by the Śruti and in the second place it means (2) purification of the mind with the aid of manana (reason) and nididhyāsana (concentration). He offers two alternative theories of the function of the Śruti in consonance with the Pañcapādikā. The first theory is to assume that Śruti immediately gives direct knowledge, and tarka only explodes the wrong conception that it is indirect. The second is to suppose that the Śruti first produces indirect knowledge only, and then with the help of 'tarka' (in its second meaning) it produces direct knowledge. Prakāśātman thinks that there is nothing incongruent in the second alternative that there can be an indirect cognition of Brahman which is self-luminous since we have all to infer the self-luminous consciousness of other persons (V., pp. 103-104). It is easy to see how dangerously near Maṇḍana and Vācaspati this latter theory is, for Vācaspati says "when we reason and then meditate, what we had reasoned about becomes the object of meditation and then intuited. In this sense, reason is subsidiary to intuition" (VB., p. 445).

(5) Two curious ways of accounting for the continuance of the appearance of the world even after the destruction of avidyā are to be found in the Vivaraṇa. The first way is to assume that the superimposition of the mind on the Ātman has been removed and hence the pramātṛtva, the nature of being a perceiver, is obliterated. Mere consciousness of the self being unrelated to the objective world, perception of duality becomes out of question, just as there is no question of a blind man perceiving colour (V., p. 203). The other view is that the liberated person realizes advaita in the state of asamprajñata-samādhi or trance, while he continues to experience duality owing to the defect arising out of the fructifying karma (V., p. 284). The continuance of the impression of Āvidyā (avidyāsaṁskāra) or Āvidyā-leśa (remnannt of Āvidyā) is of course taken for granted in deference to the opinion of Maṇḍana or Vimuktātman (V., p. 105-106). The reader will see that it is the disappearance or nonperception, and not the realization of the unreality, of the phenomenal world that is contemplated here.

(6) The 'cause' of the world can be conceived in three alternative ways, according to Prakāśātman: (1) Brahman conjoined with Māyā very much like a rope made up of two twisted strands is the cause; or (2) Brahman associated with the power of Māyā is the cause; or else (3) Brahman as the locus of Māyā the material cause, is the cause (V., p. 212). Elsewhere, (V., p. 232) Prakāśātman cites four alternative views on this matter: (1) Brahman invested with the power of māyā is the cause; only the Jīvas, its reflections, are enveloped in avidyā; (2) Brahman as reflected in māyā that is avidyā, is the cause of the world, while the pure Brahman itself is ever unsullied, the Jīvas being bound by ignorance; (3) Each of the Jīvas themselves display Brahman in the form of the world through their ignorance; owing to similarity, the several worlds are imagined to be one and the same, in the same way as the second moons fancied by different persons suffering from cataract. Brahman in itself is the cause of the world. (4) Brahman though one, transforms itself into the world owing to its own avidyā, as a person does in states like a dream. It is clear that by the time of Prakāśātman, Śaṅkara's advaita had been completely submerged in an ocean of chaotic speculations about cosmogony which had reared their heads under the auspices of the theory of objective avidyā, while the genuine method of Vedānta, the adhyārōpāpavāda, had been clean forgotten or thrown into the limbo.

6. Successors of Prakāśātman

Vedānta after Prakāśātman mostly bears his stamp on most of its details. The Vivaraṇa assimitated the teachings of Maṇḍana and Vimuktātman and refuted Bhāskara's doctrines in more unmistakable terms than the Ishta Siddhi or the Bhāmatī. It laid greater emphasis on the anirvacanīya-avidyā doctrine than either the Pancapādikā or the Ishta Siddhi, and its doctrines appealed to the succeeding Vedāntins so much, that today S'aṅkara's Vedānta is mostly equated with the doctrines of the Vivaraṇa rather than with the Bhāmatī-school. The Pratibimbavāda, the conception of Jīva as a reflection of Brahman in avidyā rather than as limited by antahkaraṇa (mind), the doctrine of Brahman and not lhe Jīva being the locus of avidyā, and the doctrine of a single avidyā in preference to that of innumerable avidyās, generally find favour with the present day Vedāntins though the study of the Bhāmatī as well as lip-service to Vācaspati's views, continues to some extent.

(1) ĀNANDA-BŌDHA

This state of affairs has been brought about chiefly by the synthetical teachings of writers like Ānanda-bōdha and Citsukhācārya who drew their inspiration from all the advaitic works of importance.

The Nyāya-Makaranda of Ānandabōdha consists of thirteen sections treating of the different topics of interest such as refutation of the difference of selves and of the knowable objects, the theory of illusion, the unreality of the world, the self-luminosity of Ātman etc. The discussion of each subject is conducted very much after the manner of the Brahma-Siddhi except for the fact that each conclusion here is couched in a formal syllogism. From Ānandabōdha onwards, the use of the mīmāṁsaka-nyāyas for the interpretation of texts and the employment of the dialectic forms of the logicians in disputation came more and more to the fore-front in Vedāntic works. For details, the present Sanskrit work may be consulted with profit.

(2) Sri Harsha

This writer's Khandana-Khandakhādya ushered in a new phase of Vedāntic discussion. Sri Harsha believes that all duality is anirvacanīya, that is to say, indefinable. He is not content like his predecessors with the assertion that the world is anirvacanīya because it is the product of avidyā of that nature. He challenges the dualists - especially the logicians - to produce an unvulnerable definition of any logical category and claims to be able to refute it in toto. He has devised a scheme of dialectic for refuting all the categories of any dualistic system. The following verse embodies the steps of procedure to be adopted in criticizing any particular position.

तत्तुल्योहस्तदीयं च योजनं विषयान्तरे ।
शृङ्खला तस्य शेषे च त्रिधा भ्रमति मत्क्रिया ॥

" My dialectic moves in three directions :

1. Hit upon some argument similar to those already advanced to criticize any new definition brought forward by the other party ;

2. or apply one of the criticisms already set forth in this work to other cases where new modes of defence are brought forward by the disputant ;

3. or else, take up any one of the many terms which make up a proposition enounced by the opposite side and begin another criticism of what it denotes on the lines already indicated, and when the opponent has exhausted his resources of an argument on that point, take to the examination of another concept in the same manner (SKh., p. 419). It goes without saying that this species of dialectics leads the disputants nowhere and that is just what hyper-criticism aims at.

Sri Harsha's contention is that advaita need not be proved inasmuch as it is self-established. Since all items of dualistic systems stand self-condemned, it necessarily follows that Reality is advaita unaffected by the anirvacanīya phenomena.

(3) Citsukhācārya

Citsukha follows Sri Harsha's foot-steps in criticizing the categories of both the Naiyāyikas and the Vaiśeshikas. The lure of logical treatment of topics, however, tempted him so much that he attempted fresh definitions and proceeded to offer logical proofs—sometimes even adopting Mahāvidyās[1] or round-about syllogisms in favour of the anirvacanīyāvidyā and other doctrines of the neo-Śaṅkarites. He thus overshoots his mark forgetting his model Sri Harsha's warning that his dialectic is interested only in demolishing the definitious of the dualists and not in defining or proving anything, since the dialectic never presumes the reality or unreality of any definition or proof. Sri Harsha's strict position is that no proof can be demanded for defending advaita since proof may be right or wrong even when what is sought to be proved is real. It is enough for him that advaita is revealed by the Upanishads.

(4) Sarvajñātman

The hypothesis that Sarvajñātman was the disciple of Sureśvarācārya is now generally discredited. That this supposition — merely based on the flimsy evidence of the word 'Deves'vara', the name of the author's guru occuring at the beginning and the end of the Saṅkshepa-Śārīraka — lacks historical support, has been now proved upto the hilt. But even in the absence of such a proof, a cursory glance at the contents of the work would be enough to show that Sarvajñātman has no connection whatever with Sures'vara, for the Saṅkshepa-Śārīraka from his pen is no more than an exposition of the objective anirvacaniyāvidyā doctrine unknown to Sures'vara.

1. This species of sophistic syllogisms said to have been started by Kularka Pandita were first refuted by Vadindra in his Mahavidya-Vidambana.

The procedure adopted here is mainly on the lines of the Vivaraṇa. Besides conducting a detailed examination of the relation between adhyāsa and avidyā, Sarvajñātman made certain contributions of out-standing importance to this school. The following deserve special mention :

1. He maintains that positive statements like 'Tat tvam asi' (that thou art) are better suited to describe the nature of Ātman than negative texts like 'neti neti' (SS. 1-250 to 262).

2. That Brahman through the medium of avidyā and not Brahman qualified by or reflected in avidyā - is the cause of the world (1-320 to 333).

3. That perception is a pramāṇa for sanmātra or pure being (1-45, 55) and Bādarāyaṇa rejects the Ārambhavāda (of the Vais'eshikas), the Saṅghātavāda (of the Buddhas), and the Pariṇāmavāda (of the Sāṅkhyas), and prefers the Vivartavāda alone. It is admitted, however, that from the arōpā stand-point, the Sūtrakāra teaches the Pariṇāmavāda for the use of the lowest grade of enquirers and Vivarta for the mediocre minds while he reserves the advaita-dṛshti for the highest minds. Sarvajñātman is an ekajīva-vādin that is to say, he holds that Brahman alone has become the jīva and sees the world in the form of Ākāśa etc. The preceptor, the Veda and reason--all figments of avidyā--are the means of getting rid of this jīva-nature (2-162, 163). He therefore, rejects Maṇḍana's and Vācaspati Miśra's doctrine that the locus of avidyā is jīva (2-174). Pure Consciousness that knows no distnctions is alone the locus and object (aśrayatva-vishayatva-bhāginī nirvibhāga-citi-reva kevalā आश्रयत्वविषयत्वभागिनी निर्विभागचितिरेव केवला). The knowledge of the true meaning of the mahāvākyas like 'that thou art', says Sarvajñātman, results from dispassion, the discrimination of the meaning of the words 'that' and 'thou' in the text, the determination of the true import of the text and practice of Sādhana or discipline, both external and internal.

In the course of the discussion of the meaning of the word 'thou' (in the Vedāntic text) Sarvajñātman argues that agency and enjoyment of the fruits of action do not really pertain to the nature of the self since they are both objectified by the conciousness of the self while in sleep all is merged in avidyā as may be verified by waking-memory. Śaṅkara's denial of avidyā in sleep should be interpreted only to mean that we do not conceive it clearly as distinct from us. Ignorance is of course unreal since it is known through intuition (3-113 to 131, 139). Sarvajñātman sets great store by the import of the mahāvākyas or texts that teach the identity of the individual and the Supreme-self. The Upādhis, the semblance of cit (consciousness), the reflection of cit and also the original cit itself are all the component factors that make up the object denoted by the words 'that' and 'thou'. The author explains at length how the Śruti aims at teaching the absolute or secondless cit as the 'akhaṇḍārtha' as it is technically called. The original should be carefully studied before one is able to appreciate this complicated teaching (3-306 to 318).

The distinction of sadyōmukti and jīvanmukti is another special feature of Sarvajñātman's teaching. Ignorance is utterly burnt up by knowledge and so the knowing one is immediately released. Jīvanmukti taught by the scripture is not to be taken seriously (4-38, 39). An alternative opinion is also allowed that the apparent continuance (bādhitānuvṛtti) of avidyā even after it is blotted out is possible till the fructifying karma is exhausted (4-10 to 46). Sarvajñātman perfected the doctrines of anirvacanīya-bhāva-vidyā in many respects. He was mostly in favour of the Vivaraṇa school and therefore ruthlessly opposed many of the Maṇḍana and Vācaspati doctrines by adopting a dialectic of his own. As many as seven different theories about the locus of avidyā have been enumerated and confuted by this writer, thus showing that the monism of avidyā-speculators had been split up into several different sub-schools by that time.

Conclusion

This short sketch of the history of Vedantic thought from the remotest times up to the time of Sarvajñātman, is expected to give the reader an idea of the various attempts and failures of several Vedāntins at systematizing the Upanishadic doctrines. This epoch is marked by three principal turning points :

1. The ancient period presenting a phase comprising many divergent schools of monism along with the traditional school, the precursor of Gauḍapāda's, which was perhaps not very dominent then.

2. The middle period presenting the phase of vivid consciousness of the un-adulterated traditional method represented by Gauḍapāda, S'aṅkara and Sures'wara.

3. The third period presenting the phase of the objective-avidyā doctrine of many shades professing to follow and defend S'aṅkara's views against a solitary dissidence–that of Bhāskara-but casting the traditional method into the shade. This period is also marked by a tendency to speculate and ratiocinate, as well as a fondness for interpreting Vedantic texts in alternative ways in disregard of experience, quietly ignoring the principle that truth and reality are unalterably uniform in their nature.

The human mind has been, from time immemorial, in quest of universal and absolutely certain knowledge of truth and reality and the result has been the emergence of so many systems of philosophy in conflict with one another. Nevertheless, the intensity of the search is not abated a whit, and philosophers are sure and certain of getting at the truth some day. Neither empirical science which relies on the data supplied by the senses, nor speculation which hopes to build up a consistent system with the help of reason applied to partial experience can satisfy this hunger for truth or fulfil the hope for the simple reason that both are limited to partial views of reality. Moreover, the procedure of both science and speculation is circumscribed by time and space, two factors that cast a doubt on the finality of the conclusion of either. Critical reason no doubt can espouse the claim of individual speculative systems or even show the hollowness of the pretensions of all reasoning as such, but can never land us in truth or reality for it is primarily a faculty of examining but not of creating or revealing views and facts. A critical philosopher can hastily conclude that the human mind is unable to know the real in itself, or can at best suspend his judgment. The mystic can indeed pride himself on the direct vision of Reality in a special trance not vouchsafed to ordinary mortals. But others may question the genuineness of that vision for the very reason that it is limited to a particular state of particular individuals and not universal as Reality ought to be.

The Upanishads, however, have found a way out of this labyrinth. They declare with one voice that truth and reality combined in one, can be intuited in one's own self when one transcends both the senses and the mind. This intuition of the Self is universal, for, as Śaṅkara says, everyone is conscious of one's own existence and can never conceive the opposite. And this Self is the Reality (SB. p.6). Again this intuition is limited neither by time nor by space for both of these belong to the region of the not-self and are conceivable only by the empirical me which again pre-supposes the true Self. The latter can be neither affirmed nor doubted, neither proved nor disproved to exist, neither accepted nor rejected, neither experienced as an object nor thought away, for it is the prius which supplies the very ground of these thought-processes. Only variant views of it are possible for speculators, whence it follows that the

THE TRADITION BEFORE S'AṄKARA

1. GAUDAPĀDA

S'aṅkara is the earliest teacher whose extant Bhāshyas give us a picture of the unique method of Vedānta in all its working detail. But he is by no means the first discoverer of the method. In fact he remembers with great reverence the ancient teachers[1] who wrote commentaries on all the Upanishads even before him. Of such teachers, it is some satisfaction to know that there is at least one whose work is extant till today ; and that is Gaudapada who has summarized the teachings of the Upanishads in his kārikās or expository verses on the Māṇḍūkya. For a fuller information regarding this work, the reader is referred to my Sanscrit commentary, the Māṇḍūkya Rahasya-vivṛti. Here I shall merely indicate in outlines how Gouḍapāda was perfectly aware of this traditional method.

In the Āgama Prakaraṇa, or the first chapter of his work, so named because it expounds the traditional method adopted in the S'ruti, he shows how the three different aspects of Ātman—outwardly conscious, inwardly conscious or pure consciousness—are merely super-impositions on the Turīya or the Real Self which is forever untainted with svapna-nidrā (dream sleep or wrong knowledge) or asvapna-nidrā (dreamless sleep or absence of knowledge I-11 to 15) and closes his teaching with the observation " that

1. The second opening verse, Tai. Bh.

Many an attempt at interpretation of the Upanishads has become a failure just because the various systematizers were not aware of this unique method of procedure adopted in the s'rutis. While most of the systems, detailed in the present work were aware of the monistic tendency of the Upanishads, they uncritically presumed that the present state of the Jīva is a fall from the ideal Brahmic nature, and so some effort is necessary to re-transform it into its pristine glory. They never suspected for a moment that the essential nature of each one of us as well as of the whole world of duality is really Brahman or the Absolute, eternally unsullied by a second, except for the super-impositions of avidyā.

The credit of having drawn the attention of Vedāntins to the only traditional method of interpreting the Upanishads, which successfully reconciles all the apparently conflicting texts and points to a system in those sacred writings, belongs, as shown in the pages of this book, to Gauḍapāda, S'aṅkara and Sures'wara – the three resplendent stars that sparkle un-bedimmed in the Vedāntic heavens. Guided by them we can all listen to the heart-stirring teachings of the Upanishads which sing the glory of Brahman and exhort us to give up our mental aberrations due to avidyā, and return to our Brahmic nature which is really ours now and for ever.

अज्ञानम् – ज्ञानाभावादिव्रितयव्यतिरिक्ता अनिर्वचनीया अविद्याशक्तिः (पं. पा.) २७९; भ्रान्त्यादिष्वनुगतम्, (इ. सि.) ४८१–४८४; शुक्त्यज्ञानसतत्त्वम्, (इ. सि.) ४८९–४९६, ४९६–५०२; अज्ञाननिवृत्तिः, (इ.सि.) ५०५–५०९; सा निवृत्तिः किद्वैक्षणा ? (इ. सि.) ५०९–५११; ब्रह्माज्ञानं क्रमेणैव निवर्त्यते, (इ.सि.) ५११–५१८; अज्ञानोपादानकोऽध्यासः, (पं. वि.) ५३६–५३८; अज्ञान-(अविद्याशक्ति)सिद्धिः, (पं. वि.) ५३८–५४०; अज्ञानविषये सप्तविविधविकल्पाः प्रतिषेध्याः, (सं.) ६६१–६६२.

आगमतर्कौ – तयोरनुभवपर्यवसायित्वम्, (भ.) ४९–५१; शास्त्रतर्कयोः कृत्यम्, (पं.पा.) ३२२–३२४; शास्त्रतर्कसंबन्धः, (वा. भा.) ४१५–४१७; विमुक्तात्मनस्तर्कप्रधानत्वम्, (इ. सि.) ४६७; शब्दावगते ब्रह्मणि तर्कस्य कृत्यम्, (पं.वि.) ५८१–५८२.

आत्मनिष्ठा – ज्ञानोत्पत्त्यनन्तरं केवलं ज्ञाननिष्ठैव, (भ.) १०८–१०९.

आत्मपरिणामवादः – शक्तिविक्षेप एव परिणामः, (भा.) ३५९–३६३.

आत्मनोऽस्तित्वप्रत्ययविषयत्वम् – (भ.) ३१; औपचारिकम्, (पं. पा.) ३००–३०२; (वा. भा.) ४२६.

आत्मा – चैतन्यस्वभावः, (भ.) ६९–७१; नित्यनिरवस्थः, (भ.) ७१, ७३, ७७.

आत्मैकत्वस्य स्वतःसिद्धत्वम् – (वा.) २१६.

आविद्यकत्वम् – प्रमातृत्वकर्तृत्वयोः, (भ.) ३५–३८; विधिप्रतिषेधशास्त्रस्य, (भ.) ३८–४०; पाण्डित्यबाल्यादिसाधनानाम्, (भ.) १०६–१०८.

ऋणत्रयापाकरणवादः – (वा.) २११.

कर्मसंस्कारः – लब्धवृत्तिकर्मसंस्कारात्, तद्विपाकसंस्काराद् वा विदुषोऽपि शरीरस्थितिः, (मं.) २०३.

कामविलयवादः – द्वैतैकात्मबुद्धिसमुच्चितकर्मभिः प्राजापत्यं प्राप्य प्रविलीनसर्वकामः परमाद्वैतं प्रतिपद्यत इति वादः, (प्रा.) १३८.

कार्यकारणविवेकप्रक्रिया – कार्यस्य कारणानन्यत्वम्, (भ.) ५२-५४; कार्यकारणयोरुभयोरपि सत्यत्वम्, (भर्तृ.) १४९-१५२; कार्यकारणभावो न वास्तविकः, (वा.) २३५-२३९; जन्मादिधर्मजातस्य उपलक्षणत्वात् जन्मादिपूर्वेण ब्रह्मस्वरूपम् लक्षितम्, (पं.पा.) ३२९-३३१; ब्रह्मपरिणाम एव जगत्, (भा.) ३५१-३५९; अविद्यासहितब्रह्मोपादानं जगत् ब्रह्मण्येवास्ति तत्रैव च लीयते, (वा.भा.) ४१९-४२२; जगत्प्रकृतिर्माया अनिर्वाच्या अज्ञैवैव, (इ.सि.) ४७३-४७८; जगत्कारणवैचित्र्ये विकल्पाः, (पं.वि.) ५९३-५९६; ब्रह्मणो जगत्कारणत्वे आम्नाय एव प्रमाणम्, कालादिव्यावृत्त्यर्थं सूत्रम्, (स.) ६५३-६५५.

ख्यातिबाधविचारः – विपरीतख्यातिः, (मं.) १००-१९१; विपरीतख्यातिः (वा.), 'इदं रजतम्' इत्येवंरूपं वस्तु न कुत्रचित्, (वा.) २२८-२३०; दोषोत्थापितसंस्कारविशेषसहितसामग्रीसमुत्पन्नज्ञानस्य उदितमेव शुक्तिगतमिथ्यारजतम् आलम्बनम् अवभासते, (पं.पा.) २८४-२८७; अनिर्वचनीयम् अध्यस्तमध्यासश्च, (वा.भा.) ४००-४०२; अनिर्वचनीयस्य ख्यातिः, (इ.सि.) ४८५-४८८; अनिर्वचनीयख्यातिः, (पं.वि.) ५६५-५६९

चित्तवृत्तिनिरोधविवादः – श्रवणज्ञानादर्थान्तरं चित्तवृत्तिनिरोधरूपं विधीयतेऽतं वेदान्तेषु – इति वादः, (प्रा.) १४३-१४४.

जीवत्वाध्यासः – (वा.भा.) ४२५-४२६.

जीवन्मुक्तिः – (भ.) ११३-११५, (मं.) २०३, (वा.भा.) ४४२-४४५, (स.) ६६०-६६१.

जीवब्रह्मविभागः, जीवेश्वरविभागः – मायिकः, (भ.) ७५-७७, ८८; (भा.) ३७१-३७५; ब्रह्मणो जीवभावः अनाद्यनिर्वचनीयाविद्योपधानभेदात्, (वा.भा.) ४२७-४३०; आत्मावरणमात्माज्ञानमेव जीवब्रह्मविभागाद्यध्यासोपादानम्, (पं.वि.) ५४५-५४६; अविद्यातन्त्रोऽयं विभागः, नाविद्योपादानकः (पं.वि.) ५५६-५५७; जीवस्य ब्रह्मप्रतिबिम्बत्वम् अवच्छेदवादनिराकरणं च, (पं.वि.) ५४८-५५१.

जीवस्य व्यवहारः – उपाधिकृतः, (भा.) ३७५-३७९.

ज्ञानकर्मसमुच्चयः – विधीयते इति वादः, (प्रा.) १२३-१२६; (भर्तृ.) १७९-१८०; विधिं विना ध्यानाभ्यासकर्मसमुच्चयः तेन मिथ्याज्ञानसंस्कारनिवृत्तिः, (मं.) १९९-२०३; (भा.) ३८६-३८९.

ज्ञानसाधनानि, मुक्तिसाधनं च – कर्मादीनि, (भ.) ९६-१००; तदनुष्ठानावधिः, (भ.) १००-१०२; ज्ञानसाधनविचारः, (पं.पा.) ३३३-३३६; साधनानुक्रमः (वा.) २७०-२७१; ज्ञानवत् कर्म विमुक्तिसाधनम् (भा.) ३८६-३९०; (वा.भा.) ४४५-४४८; (न्या.म.) ६१७.

ज्ञानविधिः – ज्ञानापरामिधानोपासनाविधिशेषत्वं ब्रह्मणः, (प्रा.) १२६-१२८; ज्ञानविधिः, (प्रा.) १२९-१३० ; ज्ञानविधिचिन्ता, (वा.) २५८-२६२.

ज्ञानाभ्यास(प्रसङ्ख्यान)विधिः – ज्ञानाभ्यासावश्यकता, (प्रा.) १३०-१३३.

ज्ञानोपासने – तयोर्वैलक्षण्यम्, (भ.) ९३-९८ ; तयोरैक्यम्, (प्रा.) १२६ ; अभ्यासेन ज्ञानं पक्वं भवति, (भा.) ३९१.

दृग्दृश्यप्रक्रिया – द्रष्टृस्वरूपनिर्धारणम्, (भ.) ६२-६५ ; दृष्टेर्द्रष्टा इत्यस्यार्थः, (भर्तृ.) १५६-१५८ ; दृष्टिश्रुत्यादीनां धर्मत्वं विज्ञानात्मनो धर्मित्वं च, (भर्तृ.) १५९-१६० ; दृष्टेरेकस्या एव भेदावभासः, (वा.) २४४-२४७ ; दृग्दृश्ययोर्न भेदः, नाभेदः, (इ. सि.) ४६८-४६९.

द्वैतम् – तस्य मिथ्यात्वं नाम वस्तुतः परमार्थानन्यत्वमेव, (भ.) ८१-८३ ; अविद्याकल्पितमेव, (वा.) २७३-२७४.

निदिध्यासनम् – उपासनानिदिध्यासनयोर्वैलक्षण्यम्, (भ.) १०३-१०६ ; निदिध्यासनविधिः, (भर्तृ.) १७७ ; निदिध्यासनं नाम अपरायत्तबोधः, (वा.) २६३ ; पातञ्जलोक्तं ध्यानम्, चिन्तासन्ततिः, (वा. भा.) ४५२ ; श्रवणमात्रानपोढाज्ञाननिवर्तकं साधनम्, (इ. सि.) ५१४ ; एकाग्रगुणनिर्मापकं श्रवणस्य फलोपकार्यङ्गम्, (पं. वि.) ५८२, ५८८ ; चित्तस्य चिन्मात्रशेषता, (स.) ६६०.

पञ्चकोशविवेकः – पञ्चकोशानां पूर्वपूर्वस्य उत्तरस्मिन्नुत्तरस्मिन् प्रविलयेन ब्रह्मज्ञानम्, (भ.) ६६ ; कोशानां कारणे प्रविलयपूर्वकं कोशातीतब्रह्मज्ञानम्, (वा.) २४२-२४४ ; भास्करानूदितवृत्तिकारमतं कोशविचारे, (भा.) ३७९-३८१.

प्रक्रिया – वेदान्तप्रक्रियाया दुरूहत्वे निमित्तम्, १-३ ; व्याख्यानादृतविविधप्रक्रियाविषये आक्षेपसमाधानानि, ४-१३ ; प्रक्रियाप्रत्यभिज्ञापनाय यत्न आस्थेयः, १३ ; तन्निर्धारणे अनुसर्तव्या नियमाः, १४-१७ ; स्वातन्त्र्येण प्रस्थानत्रयपरीक्षणम् प्रक्रियानिर्धारणे निष्फलम्, १८-२५ ; भगवत्पादसंमता सांप्रदायिकी प्रक्रिया, २७ ; अध्यारोपापवादप्रक्रियैव मूलप्रक्रिया, २८.

प्रतिपत्तिविधिः – ब्रह्म उपासनारूपप्रतिपत्तिविधिशेषमिति प्राचीनप्रस्थानम् तन्निराकरणं च भाष्यकारेण, १२६-१२९ ; विविधप्रतिपत्तिविधिप्रकाराणां निराकरणम्, (पं.) ३२४-३२६ ; प्रतिपत्तिविधिनिराकरणपूर्वकं विधिं विनैव ध्यानाभ्यासपक्षस्वीकारः, (मं., वा.भा.) ४५२-४५६, तद्विमर्शश्च ४५७-४५८ ; एतदेव पक्षमनुसृत्य 'शब्दादवगते ब्रह्मणि सुखसंवेदनत्वात् अभ्यासेनापरोक्षीकृते विधिमन्तरेण ब्रह्मसाक्षात्करणम् इति (पं. वि.) पक्षः, ५८४-५८५.

प्रत्यक्षादिगतविचारः – प्रत्यक्षादीनाम् आविद्यकत्वम्, (भ.) ४२, ८३ ; प्रत्यक्षाद्यगोचरं ब्रह्म, (भ.) ४९ ; शास्त्रस्य प्रत्यक्षादिविरुद्धत्वाभासपरिहारः (भ.) ८३-८६ ;

प्रत्यक्षादिविरोधे आम्नाय एव बलवान्, (मं.) १९२-१९४; प्रत्यक्षादिफलत्वेन संमता अवगतिरेव वेदान्तप्रमेया, (वा.) २३१; शास्त्रस्य प्रत्यक्षादिविरोधं नानुमन्यन्ते वार्तिककाराः, २३४-२३५; प्रत्यक्षादीनां मिथ्यात्वं नास्ति, (भा.) ३४७; ज्येष्ठमपि प्रत्यक्षप्रमाणं न शास्त्राद् बलवत्, (वा. भा.) ४१२; प्रत्यक्षादीनां स्वप्नव्यवहारवत् प्रामाण्यव्यवहारः, (इ. सि.) ५०२-५०३; प्रत्यक्षादीनां व्यावहारिकं प्रामाण्यम् (न्या. म.) ६०८-६१०.

प्रपञ्चविलयवादः – प्राचीनं प्रस्थानम्, १३३-१३७.

प्रमाणविचारः – प्रमाणव्यवहारस्य आविद्यकत्वम्, (भ.) ३५-४२; तत्सत्यत्वं व्यवहारे, (भा.) ३४७; प्रमाणानां व्यावहारिकं प्रामाण्यं ब्रह्माविषयकत्वं च, (मं.) १९२-१९४; प्रमाणव्यापारः, (वा.) २२५-२२७; प्रमाणव्यवहारस्य मिथ्यात्वं नास्ति, (भा.) ३४६-३४७; प्रमाणानामाविद्यकत्वं कथम्? (पं. पा.) ३१३-३१५; (वा. भा.) ४०८-४१०; प्रत्यक्षादीनां प्रामाण्यं कथम्? (इ.सि.) ५०२-५०३; प्रमातृप्रमाणादिव्यवहारसंभवः, (पं. वि.) ५५८-५६८; प्रमाणसत्ताङ्गीकारे विवादः, (खं. खा.) ६२१-६२२; प्रमेयापरोक्ष्यम्, (पं. पा.) ३१६-३१८.

प्रसङ्ख्यानवादः – ज्ञानाभ्यासविधिवादः, (प्रा.) १३०-१३३.

प्रस्थानानि – वेदान्तार्थसिद्धान्तप्रकारविशेषाः; प्रस्थानत्रये प्रतिष्ठापिता प्रक्रिया विविधभाष्यकारैराकुलीकृता, १; व्याख्यानप्रस्थानोनां द्वैतिवेदान्तिप्रस्थानानां चोदयादपि प्रक्रियाप्रत्यभिज्ञानं कष्टसाध्यं जातम्, २-३; व्याख्यानप्रस्थानानां विरोधपरिहारः, तद्विमर्शश्च, ४-१७; प्रस्थानत्रयग्रन्थशरीरपरीक्षणम्, १८-२५; श्रीशङ्करभगवत्पादभाष्यप्रस्थानम्, २६-११७; प्राचीनप्रस्थानपरीक्षा, ११८-१४७; भर्तृप्रपञ्चप्रस्थानपरीक्षा, १४८-१८२; मण्डनप्रस्थानपरीक्षा, १८३-२०९; वार्तिकप्रस्थानपरीक्षा, २१०-२७६; पञ्चपादिकाप्रस्थानपरीक्षा, २७७-३३६; भास्करप्रस्थानपरीक्षा, ३३७-३९३; भामत्यादिव्याख्यानप्रस्थानानां परीक्षा, ३९४-५९८; न्यायमकरन्दादिप्रकरणप्रस्थानानां परीक्षा, ५९९-६६३; प्रस्थानपरीक्षाफलम्, ६६४.

प्रातिभासिकार्थः – शुक्तिरजतादिज्ञानविषयः, (पं. पा.) २८६-२८७; तस्य कारणमज्ञानम्, (इ. सि.) ४७८-४७९; तद्विषये कल्पना, (पं. वि.) ५६२-५६५; (न्या.म.) ६०३, ६०५.

बद्धमुक्तव्यवस्था – ब्रह्मैवेकं नित्यमुक्तं स्वाश्रयविषयाज्ञानवशतः संसरति, ज्ञानेन च मुच्यत इति व्यवस्था कथम्? (स.) ६५९.

बीजभावावशेषः – बुद्धिसंबन्धस्य सुषुप्तिप्रलयादिषु, (भ.भा.) ३८५-३८६; (वा.भा.) ४३९-४४०.

भागवतमतम् – ध्यानेनैव ईश्वरसायुज्यमिति वादः, (प्रा.) १४४–१४७.

भाष्यकाराः – प्राचीना अर्वाचीनाश्च वेदान्तसिद्धान्ते विप्रतिपन्नाः, १–३.

भेदनिरासः, – (मं. वा.) २११; (इ. सि.) ४६८–४६९; (न्या. म.) ६०१–६०२.

भेदाभेदः – भिन्नाभिन्नं जगत् ब्रह्मणः, (भा.) ३५२–३५३; जीवश्च भिन्नाभिन्नः, ३७१–३७३; भेदाभेदनिरासः, (वा. भा.) ४३०–४३२.

महावाक्यम् – तत्त्वमस्यादिवाक्यानि महावाक्यानि, तेषामखण्डार्थबोधकत्वम्, महावाक्यज्ञानेन च मोक्षः, (स.) ६४८–६५०.

माया– अविद्याध्यस्ता प्रकृतिः, (भ.) ५५; (भा.वा.) ४२४; अविद्या मायाशब्दवाच्या, (मं.) १८६; नामरूपादिरूपेण प्रथमानाया अविद्यायाः सौक्ष्म्यम्, (वा.) २३८; प्रकृतिरेव अविद्या, माया च, (पं.पा.) २७९; मायावादनिरासः, (भा.) ३६३-३६४; लयलक्षणया अविद्यया विक्षेपसंस्कारेण च प्रत्युपस्थापितनामरूपमेव माया, (वा.भा.) ४२४; मायैवाविद्या, (इ. सि.) ४७१–४७३, ४७४–४७८; मायैवाविद्या, (पं.वि.) ५६९–५७२, विक्षेपप्राधान्येन माया आच्छादनप्राधान्येन अविद्या–इति, इच्छाधीनत्वतद्वैपरीत्येन वा व्यपदेशभेदः, ५७१.

मुक्तिः, मोक्षः – आत्मन्यवस्थानम्, (भ.)१०९–११२; जीवन्मुक्तेर्मुख्यत्वम्, (भ). ११३–११४; द्विविधम् साक्षात्कृतब्रह्मत्वम्, शरीरपातोत्तरं ब्रह्मणि लयश्च – इति (भर्तृ.)१७२; मोक्षे वार्तिकमतम्, (वा.)१७३; अन्तरालावस्था अपवर्गाख्या, (भर्तृ.) १७३–१७६; कर्ममात्रसाध्यत्वं मुक्तेः, (प्रा.) ११८–११९; मोक्षप्राप्तिप्रकारः, (मं.) २०३–२०६; अविद्यानाश एव मोक्षः, (वा.) २७१–२७२; द्विधा मुक्तिः, जीवदवस्थायां रागद्वेषमोहैः, तदङ्गैश्च महदादिभिः, पातोत्तरकालमात्यन्तिकीति, (भा.) ३९२; जीवन्मुक्तिनिरासः, (भा.) ३९२; स्वरूपावस्थानम्, (वा. भा.) ४४१–४४२; जीवन्मुक्तिरप्यस्ति, (वा. भा.) ४४२–४४५; अविद्यायास्तत्त्वसाक्षात्कारतो निःशेषविनिवृत्तिर्मुक्तिः, (न्या. म.) ६१४; जीवन्मुक्तिरविद्यालेशात् सिध्यति, (चि.) ६४२; मुक्तिर्ज्ञानफलत्वान्नित्या, अविद्याविलयनात्मिकैव वा मुक्तिः, (स.) ६६०; जीवन्मुक्तिविषये मतद्वयम्, (स.) ६६०–६६१.

योगः – सनकादिशास्त्रविहितो योगो ध्यानधारणसमाधिलक्षण आवश्यकः, (भा.) ३९१.

विज्ञानस्मृतिसंततिवादः – उदिते श्रवणादिज्ञाने तत्स्मृतिसन्ततिर्विधीयते इति वादः, (प्रा.) १४२–१४३.

शमादिविधिः – शमादिसंपन्नो भूत्वा महिम्नः पदविद् भवेत् इति विधिः, (वा.) २६७–२७०.

शास्त्रम् – शास्त्रमन्त्यं प्रमाणम्, (भ.) ४२–४४; शास्त्रप्रामाण्ये आक्षेपसमाधानानि, (मं.) १९४–१९६; ब्रह्मणः शास्त्रप्रमाणकत्वे आक्षेपसमाधानानि, (मं.) १९६–१९९; शास्त्रप्रामाण्यम्, (वा.) २३०–२३४; शास्त्रप्रामाण्ये शङ्कापरिहाराः, (पं. पा.) ३१८–३२१; शास्त्रप्रामाण्यम्, (भा.) ३४५–३४८; शास्त्रप्रामाण्यम्, (वा. भा.) ४१०–४१५; ब्रह्मणः शास्त्रकारणत्वम्, (पं. वि.) ५७५–५७६; तस्य शास्त्रप्रमाणकत्वम्, (पं. वि.) ५७७–५८०.

शून्यवादिनोऽपि कथायां प्रवेशः – प्रमाणासत्ताभ्युपगमनियमाभावात् शून्यवादिनापि कथा शक्यप्रारम्भा, (खं. खा.) ६२३–६२४.

श्रवणादिसाधनानि – श्रवणादीनि साक्षात् ज्ञानसाधनानि, (भ.) ९६; निदिध्यासने श्रवणादिवदेव विधिः – (भर्तृ.) १७७; श्रवणादयो विधीयन्ते, निदिध्यासनं तु विज्ञानरूपत्वात् न विधीयते, (वा.) २६०–२६२; श्रवणादिविषये भाष्यवार्तिकाभिप्रायतुलना, २६२–२६७; श्रवणाद्यावृत्तिरावश्यिकी, (भा.) ३९०; वाक्यश्रवणमात्रान्न साक्षात्कारः, (वा. भा.) ४५८–४६२; श्रवणाद्यपदेश अर्थवादः, (पं. पा.) ३३५; श्रवणं मनननिदिध्यासनाभ्यां फलोपकार्यङ्गाभ्यां विधीयते, (पं. वि.) ५८५–५८९.

समाधिः – द्रष्टव्य इति समाधेरुपदेशः, (वा. भा.) ४५२; असंप्रज्ञातसमाधौ आत्मैकत्वदर्शनम्, (पं. वि.) ५७३.

साक्षात्कारः – साक्षात्कारोऽप्यपेक्ष्यते अभयप्राप्तेरनन्तरम्, (भर्तृ.) १७२; तत्त्वदर्शने जातेऽपि अभ्यासात् साक्षात्कारः, (मं.) १९९–२००; साक्षात्कारपर्यन्तमेव ज्ञानं संसारनिवृत्तिकृत्, (वा. भा.) ४४६–४४९; अज्ञाननिवृत्तिद्वारा ज्ञानस्य साक्षात्कारहेतुत्वम्, (इ.सि.) ५१८–५१९. (अपरोक्षशब्दोऽप्यत्र द्रष्टव्यः ॥)

साधनसोपानम् – कर्मादिसाधनपरम्परा मुक्तये, (वा.) २७०–२७९; (वा. भा.) ४४५.

स्वप्रकाशविचारः – स्वप्रकाशविज्ञानवादः, (खं. खा.) ६२५–६२८; स्वप्रकाशत्वम्, (चि.) ६३९–६४०.

अध्यात्मप्रकाशमुद्रणालयः, होळेनरसीपुरम्. १०००, ६-६-१९६४.
